

THE THIRTEENTH OF FEBRUARY: THE RED CHAMBER.

THE WANDERING JEW.

BY EUGÈNE SUE,

AUTHOR OF "THE MYSTERIES OF PARIS," ETC. ETC.

WITH ONE HUNDRED AND FOUR ENGRAVINGS,
DRAWN ON WOOD BY M. VALENTIN, AND EXECUTED BY THE MOST EMINENT ENGLISH ENGRAVERS, UNDER THE SUPERINTENDENCE OF MR. CHARLES HEATH.

IN THREE VOLUMES.

VOL. II.

LONDON:
CHAPMAN AND HALL, 186 STRAND.

MDCCCXLVI.

LONDON: .
PRINTED BY GEORGE BARCLAY, CASTLE STREET,
LEICESTER SQUARE.

CONTENTS

OF

THE SECOND VOLUME.

	Page
Chap. I.—The Two Brothers of “the Good Work” .....	1
PART I.—“THE THIRTEENTH OF FEBRUARY.”
II.—The House in the Rue Saint François .....	13
III.—“The 13th of February.”—Debits and Credits .....	18
IV.—The Heir .....	26
V.—Rupture .....	36
VI.—The Return .....	44
VII.—The Red Chamber .....	51
VIII.—The Will .....	56
IX.—The Last Stroke of Noon .....	61
X.—Donation by the Living .....	68
XI.—A Good Genius .....	76
XII.—The First Last, and the Last First .....	83
PART VII.—THE PROTECTOR.
XIII.—The Unknown .....	94
XIV.—The Retreat .....	102
XV.—The Unexpected Visit .....	108
XVI.—A Friendly Service .....	113
XVII.—Insidious Counsels .....	120
XVIII.—The Accuser .....	127
XIX.—The ex-Secretary of Père d’Aigrigny .....	134
XX.—Sympathy .....	142
XXI.—Mistrust .....	150
XXII.—Explanations .....	156
XXIII.—Revelations .....	164
XXIV.—Pierre Simon .....	171
XXV.—The Indian in Paris .....	178
XXVI.—The Sleeping Apartment .....	185
XXVII.—Doubts .....	192
XXVIII.—The Letter .....	199
XXIX.—Adrienne and Djalma .....	206
XXX.—Confidences and Counsels .....	213
XXXI.—La Mayeux’s Journal .....	222
XXXII.—La Mayeux’s Journal .....	228
XXXIII.—The Discovery .....	235

PART VIII. — THE FACTORY.

	Page
Chap. XXXIV.—The Gathering of the “Loups” .....	242
XXXV.—The “Maison Commune” .....	252
XXXVI.—The Secret .....	261
XXXVII.—The Secret ( continued ) .....	265
XXXVIII.—Disclosures .....	272
XXXIX.—The Attack .....	279
XL.—The Loups and the Dévorans .....	284
XLI.—The Return .....	289

PART IX. — THE BLACK PANTHER OF JAVA.

XLII.—The Negotiator .....	297
XLIII.—The Secret .....	305
XLIV.—The Confession .....	309
XLV.—Love .....	315
XLVI.—Execution .....	321
XLVII.—The Champs Elysées .....	328
XLVIII.—Behind the Curtain .....	332
XLIX.—The Rise of the Curtain .....	337
L.—La Mort .....	341

PART X. — THE COUNCIL.

LI.—The Traveller .....	351
LII.—The Collation .....	355
LIII.—The Balance-Sheet .....	365

NAWAB SALAR JUNG BAHADUR.

THE TWO BROTHERS OF THE GOOD WORK.

THE WANDERING JEW.

CHAPTER I.

THE TWO BROTHERS OF "THE GOOD WORK."

FARINGHEA, though born in India, had, as has before been stated, travelled much; and having frequently visited the various European establishments situated in the different parts of Asia, had acquired both the French and English languages, and, possessed as he was of uncommon quickness, tact, and intelligence, was more than equal to the most civilised individual, in any matter where address, penetration, or shrewdness were required.

Instead, therefore, of replying to the question of Rodin, he fixed on him a deep and searching look. The socius, impatient at his silence, and presaging, with a vague feeling of apprehension, that Faringhea's visit, either directly or indirectly, bore reference to Djalma, he reiterated his previous question, still speaking in a tone of calm indifference.

"To whom, sir," repeated he, "have I the honour of speaking?"

"Do you not recollect me?" asked Faringhea, advancing a step or two towards Rodin's chair.

"I do not think I have ever had the honour of seeing you before the present minute," answered Rodin, coldly.

"Yet I remember you very well," said Faringhea. "I saw you at the Château de Cardoville on the day of the great storm, when the steam-vessel and the three-masted ship were wrecked."

"At the Château de Cardoville? It is very possible you might, sir, as I happened to be there during the storm you speak of."

"On that day I called you by your name. You inquired what I wanted of you? I told you, 'Nothing then, but much at another time.' Well, that time has come, and here I am to tell you what I wanted with you."

"My dear sir," replied the still impassive Rodin, "before we continue this conversation, which to me is somewhat incomprehensible, I must again repeat my desire to know the name of the individual I am honoured by conversing with. You introduced yourself to me under the pretext of being the bearer of some communication from M. Joshua Van Daël, a respectable merchant in the island of Java."

"Do you know the handwriting of M. Joshua?" inquired Faringhea, interrupting Rodin.

"Perfectly."

"Look here, then," said the Mulatto, drawing from his pocket (he was attired in a sort of half-shabby, half-genteel European costume) the voluminous despatch taken by him from Mahal, the Javanese smuggler, after he had strangled him on the shore at Batavia. These papers Faringhea displayed before the eyes of Rodin, without, however, letting them go out of his grasp.

"That is M. Joshua's writing, certainly," said Rodin, extending his hand towards the packet, which the Mulatto quickly and prudently replaced in his pocket. "My dear sir, you must permit me to tell you, that you have a most singular method of executing your commission. This letter being addressed to me, and intrusted to you by M. Joshua, you have but to deliver it as——"

"M. Joshua did not entrust me with it," said Faringhea, interrupting Rodin.

"Then how did it come into your hands?"

"A smuggler of Java betrayed me. Joshua had secured this man's passage to Alexandria, and had given him this packet of writing to go on board with for the European mail. Well, I strangled the smuggler, took his letter, presented myself in his stead on board the ship, and here I am!"

The Strangler pronounced these words in a tone of brutal boasting, his bold daring glance encountering, with unflinching steadiness, the scrutinising regards of Rodin, who, at this singular avowal, hastily raised his head, as though he would fain read the features of him who exultingly proclaimed his hardy villany.

Faringhea had expected both to astonish and terrify Rodin by this species of swaggering brutality; but, to his infinite surprise, the socius, imperturbable and unmoved as though he had not attached any meaning to the words, merely replied,—

"Ah, indeed! so they strangle men at Java, do they?"

"Yes; and elsewhere, too," said Faringhea, with a bitter and ironical smile.

"I cannot credit your words; but I must confess your candour is astonishing. Monsieur ——, what is your name?"

"Faringhea!"

"Well, then, M. Faringhea, be pleased to tell me what aim you have in this strange conversation? It appears that, by a most horrible crime, you have seized upon a letter addressed to me, and yet you hesitate to give it into my hands."

"Because I have read it, and because it may serve my purpose."

"Oh, you have read it?" said Rodin, somewhat disturbed; then added, "Why, certainly, after the somewhat unusual manner in which you became possessed of the letter, one ought not to expect you would be very ceremonious in other respects. And may I inquire what you found in the contents of this letter that you presume you shall find useful?"

"Why, I learnt, brother, that you, like myself, are a son of the 'good work.'"

"What good work do you mean?" said Rodin, greatly astonished.

Faringhea, in a tone of biting sarcasm, answered,—

"Why, M. Joshua says, in his letter,—

" 'Obedience and courage, secrecy and patience, cunning and audacity, union and universal accord among us, who have the universe for our country, our order for our family, and Rome for our queen.' "

"It is quite possible M. Joshua may so have expressed himself; but what conclusion do you draw from these words?"

"Why, our 'order' has also, like yours, brother, the whole world for its country; like you, our accomplices are our family; and for our queen we have Bohwanie."

"I have not the pleasure of knowing that saint," said Rodin, with affected humility.

"She is our Rome," returned the Strangler. "Joshua speaks of other members of your 'work,' who, scattered over the globe, labour for the glory of Rome, your queen. Well, so have we got members of our work labouring in various lands for the glory of Bohwanie!"

"And who are these sons of Bohwanie, M. Faringhea?"

"Men resolute, audacious, patient, wary, and unflinching; who, to promote the 'good work,' are ready to sacrifice father, mother, brother, and sister, and to regard as enemies all those whose creed differs from their own."

"There appears to me much that is good and praiseworthy in the persevering and exclusive spirit of this work," said Rodin, with an air of counterfeited humility and modesty; "it remains only to know what is the proposed end."

"Why, brother, we do as you do—we make corpses!"

"Corpses!" exclaimed Rodin.

"Why, yes!" cried Faringhea. "Does not M. Joshua say in his letter to you, 'The greatest glory our order can achieve is to make man as it were a corpse!' * Our sect also makes corpses of men. Dead men are sweet in the eyes of Bohwanie."

"But, M. Faringhea," cried Rodin, "M. Joshua speaks figuratively of the mind, the will, the thought, all of which should be repressed and subjected by discipline!"

"True, your order kills men's souls; ours only destroys their body: but come, brother, your hand,—we are all hunters of men!"

"But, once again," said Rodin, "I repeat, we aim at no man's life; 'tis the will and the thought that are referred to in the words you have quoted."

"And what are men, when deprived of the free exercise of thought and will, unless it be corpses? Come, come, brother, you must confess that the lump of clay left after the application of our cord is not more cold or inanimate than the beings your discipline has deprived of thought or free-will. Come, brother, own the truth; there is no shirking the fact that Rome and Bohwanie are sisters."

* We must remind our readers that the doctrine of passive and absolute obedience, which formed the stronghold of the company of Jesus, was comprised in those terrible words, uttered by the dying Loyola, "Let each member of the order be in the hands of his superiors but as a living carcase—CADAVER PERINDE AC CADAVER!"

Spite of his apparent calm, it was not without excessive alarm that Rodin saw a wretched and unprincipled creature like Faringhea the possessor of a long letter from Joshua, which most certainly referred to Djalma. True, Rodin believed he had made it utterly impossible for the young Indian to be in Paris by the following morning; but, ignorant what understanding might have been established between the prince and the Mulatto since the shipwreck, he could but regard the latter as a person who might probably be extremely dangerous. But in proportion as the socius was internally agitated and uneasy, the more did he strive to assume a cool, and even contemptuous manner towards Faringhea; he contented himself with replying, in a tone of disdainful calmness,—

"Your comparison between Rome and Bohwanie is, no doubt, very striking and apposite; but still, I do not perceive what it tends to prove."

"I wish, brother, to shew you not only what I am," said Faringhea, "but of what I am capable, in order to convince you how much better worth your while it will be to have me for your friend than your enemy."

"In other words," said Rodin, with contemptuous irony, "you belong to a murderous sect in India, and you seek by a flimsy fable to intimidate me by alluding to the fate of the man from whom you stole a packet of letters addressed to me; permit me, in my turn, to inform you, with all possible deference, M. Faringhea, that we do not strangle people here; and that, if you have any notion of making corpses in honour of your Queen Bohwanie, why, that you will just have your head cut off for the sake of another deity commonly called Justice."

"And suppose I were to attempt to poison any one, what would that same deity do to me then?"

"I would humbly beg leave to observe to you, M. Faringhea, that I have not the leisure to instruct you in our whole code of criminal jurisprudence; but, take my advice, and carefully resist every temptation either to strangle or poison any one: and, once for all, will you, or will you not, give me that letter of M. Joshua's?"

"You mean those relative to Prince Djalma, I suppose?" said the Mulatto, looking piercingly and fixedly at Rodin, who, spite of the alarm and uneasiness he felt, constrained himself sufficiently to say, in a calm and tranquil tone, while his immovable features gave no token of the internal anguish he was enduring,—

"Ignorant as I am of the contents of the letters you withhold, it is quite impossible I can answer that question. I have only to request, and if needs be, to insist, that you either deliver up those papers addressed to me, or quit this room."

"In a very few minutes, brother, you will beg and pray of me to remain."

"I doubt that!"

"A very few words will effect this wonder. When I inquired just now about the punishment for poisoning, it was because I happened to be thinking about your sending a doctor to poison Prince Djalma (at least for a time), at the Castle of Cardoville."

Spite of his habitual self-command, Rodin felt a cold shudder steal over him, as he said,—

"I really do not understand you!"

"True, I am a poor stranger, speaking your language but imperfectly; I will, however, try to make my meaning clearer. I am aware, through the letters of M. Joshua, how important it is to you that the prince should not be in Paris, or here, to-morrow, as well as all you have done to prevent it. Now, am I understood?"

"I shall not deign any reply to your question."

Two taps at the door interrupted this conversation.

"Come in!" said Rodin.

"Your letter was sent as directed, sir," said an old servant, bowing respectfully; "and here is the reply."

Rodin took the paper presented to him; but, before opening it, said cautiously to Faringhea,—

"Will you excuse me a minute?"

"Oh, never mind me," answered the Mulatto.

"You are very kind," answered Rodin; who, after having read the letter, hastily wrote a few hurried words at the end of it, and giving it to the servant, from whom he had received it, said,—

"Send this to the same address as before."

The servant bowed and retired.

"Shall I go on?" inquired the Mulatto of Rodin.

"If you please."

"Well, then, attend to me," said Faringhea. "The day before yesterday, just at the moment when, spite of his wounds and enfeebled condition, Djalma, by my advice, was about to start for Paris, there arrived a carriage loaded with rich presents for Djalma, the gifts of some unknown friend; in the carriage were two men, one sent by the unknown friend, the other, a surgeon, or doctor, or something of that sort, engaged by you to watch over the health, and take care of Prince Djalma, till his arrival in Paris,—that was charitable, was it not, brother?"

"Continue your recital, sir, if you please."

"Well, Djalma set out yesterday. By representing that the prince's wounds would suffer considerably if he did not observe a reclining position during the journey, the doctor contrived to get rid of the person sent by the unknown friend, who at once proceeded back to Paris; and he would gladly have disembarrassed himself of me also, had not the prince so warmly opposed my quitting him, that we set out yesterday evening, the prince, the doctor, and myself. When we had proceeded half way, the doctor found it necessary to stop for the night at a small inn. 'We should have abundance of time,' he said, 'to reach Paris by this evening,'—the prince having declared that it was of the first importance he should be in that city on the evening of the 12th. The doctor had been very urgent to start off with the prince in the first instance. I knew by Joshua's letter how necessary it was for your plans that he should not be in Paris on the 13th. Suspicious arose in my mind. I asked the doctor whether he knew you? He faltered, and seemed much embarrassed while answering; then my suspicions became certainties. After we reached the inn, and while the doctor was engaged with Djalma, I proceeded to the apartment prepared for our medical friend; there I found a box he had brought with him, containing various small bottles, one of them being filled with opium—that explained every thing; then I guessed the whole scheme.”

“And pray what did you guess?”

“I’ll tell you. Before the doctor retired for the night, he said to Djalma, ‘Your wounds are going on well; but the fatigue of the journey may very possibly cause some degree of inflammation; it will, therefore, be necessary for you to take a sedative draught during the day, which I will prepare for you over-night, that we may have it all ready in the carriage.’ It was easy enough to see through all this,” added Faringhea. “The next day (that is to-day) the prince was to swallow the potion about four or five o’clock in the evening, from the effects of which he would soon fall soundly asleep; then the doctor feigning uneasiness would, as night approached, stop somewhere till morning, declaring that it would be fatal to the prince to continue the journey; then, putting up at some inn, would affect to be in close attendance on the prince, taking care to prolong his slumbers till it suited your plans for him to awake. Such was your design, which appeared to me so clever that I thought I would turn it to my own account—and I have done so.”

“My dear sir,” said Rodin, biting his nails, “your words are perfectly incomprehensible to me; I understand no more of what you say than if you spoke Hebrew!”

“That is owing to the very imperfect way in which I speak your language. But tell me, do you know the array now?”

“I do not.”

“So much the worse. It is an admirable production of the island of Java, so rich in poisons.”

“I cannot perceive in what that information concerns me,” said Rodin, in a harsh and abrupt tone, the better to conceal the deadly anguish he was mentally suffering.

“You will find it concerns you a great deal,” replied Faringhea. “We children of Bohwanie have an extreme horror of shedding blood, and when we mean to tie the fatal cord around the neck of our victims, we always wait till they are soundly asleep. When their slumber does not appear to us sufficiently profound, we augment it at will. We are adepts in our art, brother: the serpent is not more subtle, the lion more daring. Djalma bears our sacred symbols marked on his flesh. The array now is an impalpable powder; by causing a person to enbale a very small quantity during sleep, or by mixing it with the tobacco a person may be smoking, the victim is cast into a deep lethargy, from which nothing can arouse him. If it is feared to administer too strong a dose at a time, the person may be made to inspire it several times during his sleep, and may thus be kept in his lethargic state, without danger, for the utmost period a man can be kept without eating or drinking—perhaps from thirty to forty hours. You see, now, how gross is the use of opium after the virtues of this divine narcotic. I had brought with me a certain quantity from Java, just out of mere curiosity, without omitting to bring its antidote also."

"Oh, then, there is an antidote?" asked Rodin, mechanically.

"To be sure there is; a plant just as unlike the poison itself as there are persons in the world unlike you and I, brother of the 'good work.' The Javanese call the juice of this root the toubac, because it instantly dissipates the drowsiness caused by the array mow, as the sun disperses the thick misty clouds. Now, being quite certain yesterday evening of the projects of your emissary against Djalma, I waited till the doctor was asleep in his bed, then I crawled into his chamber, and administered to him such a dose of array mow that he must be sound enough asleep now."

"Wretch!" exclaimed Rodin, more and more alarmed at this recital, for Faringhea had aimed a dangerous blow against the machinations of the socius and his friends—"wretch! do you not fear poisoning the man?"

"No more, brother, than he feared poisoning Djalma. This morning, therefore, we started, leaving your doctor at the inn plunged in a deep lethargic sleep; I was, therefore, alone in the carriage with Djalma, who, like a true Indian, was solacing himself with smoking. A few particles of the array mow, mixed by me among the tobacco with which I had filled his long pipe, soon rendered him drowsy; a second adroitly administered dose produced a heavy, trance-like sleep, and he is at this moment at the inn where we stopped. Now, brother, it depends on me to leave Djalma plunged in his lethargy, which will last till to-morrow evening, or to rouse him from it in an instant. So that you see it rests with me, according as you accede or not to my demands, whether Djalma shall or shall not be at No. 3 Rue Saint François to-morrow."

Thus saying, Faringhea drew from his pocket the medal of Djalma, and, shewing it to Rodin, said,

"You see I am speaking the truth. While the prince slept I took from him this medal, the only direction he has to the place he should be in to-morrow. I finish, therefore, where I began, by saying, 'Brother, I come to ask much of you!'"

For the last several minutes Rodin had been, as was his wont when suffering with intense anxiety and compelled to suppress all external evidence of it, biting his nails till the blood flowed.

At this instant the bell of the porter's lodge was rung three times, a peculiar sort of interval being observed between each sound.

Although Rodin affected to pay no attention to the noise, yet a gleam of malignant triumph sparkled in his small reptile-like eye; while Faringhea, with folded arms, stood looking at him with a half-scornful and half-triumphant expression of countenance.

"So, M. Faringhea, you have related some very marvellous histories; the only point is, do you suppose I am child enough to believe them?"

Astonished, even in spite of his natural assurance, the Mulatto started back at these words.

"What, sir!" continued Rodin, "you come here in a respectable house and boast of having feloniously obtained private letters—strangled one man, and poisoned another with a deadly drug! You are most probably some unfortunate creature whose brains and memory alike play him false. I have heard you thus long, because I wished to see how far your audacity would lead you ; for certainly no one but a shameless villain would come here, and, before a perfect stranger, boast of deeds so monstrous, so diabolical as those you have been relating : however, I have too much of Christian charity to believe your exploits, infamous as they are in relation, have ever had any other existence than in your own imagination."

Pronouncing these words with a degree of animation far from usual with him, Rodin arose from his chair, and by degrees approached the fire-place, while Faringhea, still under the influence of his first surprise, kept watching him in mute astonishment. Recovering himself by means of natural impudence, he said at length, in a half-sullen, half-brutal tone,—

"Have a care, brother, that you do not compel me to prove to you the truth of my words."

"Come, come, my good sir, you must have come from the Antipodes themselves to believe the French are a nation quite so easily duped. You say you have the wiliness of the serpent and the courage of the lion. I know nothing of your being a courageous lion, but as for your being a wily serpent I deny that you are so. What ! you have about you a letter from M. Joshua which may involve me in serious consequences (admitting that all you have been saying is any thing more than a fable), while Prince Djalma is plunged in a stupor none but you can recover him from ? You assert you can also strike a blow which will most fatally affect my interests, and you do not reflect, most terrible lion and subtlest of serpents, that all I require is to gain twenty-four hours of time. Then, you are here just arrived from the remotest parts of India, a stranger to Paris, and yourself alike unknown to every one, evidently taking me for as great a villain as yourself, since you style me 'brother !' and yet it never occurs to you that you have placed yourself entirely in my power—that the house you have chosen to enter is a lone one—the street perfectly solitary. What is to prevent my immediately summoning three or four persons capable of binding you hand and foot, strangler as you are ? and with one motion of my hand," said Rodin, deliberately touching the bell-rope, "this might be achieved. Do not be alarmed," continued he, with a diabolical smile, as he perceived Faringhea make a sudden start expressive of the surprise and terror he experienced. "Do you suppose I should waste my time in telling you all this if I really intended to act as I have described ? Now, suppose I were to have you bound and gagged, and in that state placed in some secure confinement for the next twenty-four hours ; then tell me, how could you hurt me, or interrupt my plans ? What would be easier than for me to seize upon the letters of Joshua as well as the medal of Djalma, who, sleeping under the effect of your powerful drug, could not possibly give me any annoyance ? You see, therefore, that your schemes have failed, and that your menaces are useless and impotent, simply because I know them to be based in falsehood, and because I feel perfectly assured Prince Djalma is not in your power as you say he is. Begone, then !—quit this place ; and another time when you are seeking for dupes make a better choice than you have done on the present occasion !"

Faringhea stood mute and motionless with astonishment; the words he had just heard carried conviction with them. It was true Rodin had him entirely at his mercy, and might easily cause the papers and medal to be taken from him, and, by detaining him a prisoner, render it impossible to awaken Prince Djalma; yet, with all this power in his hands, Rodin evinced no anxiety to detain him, but, on the contrary, bade him leave the place; the whole thing was past the comprehension of the Mulatto.

After in vain puzzling his imagination for the cause of this inexplicable conduct, the Strangler came at length to the conclusion that no doubt, spite of the proofs he had produced of his sincerity, Rodin utterly disbelieved what he had said relative to Djalma; being in his power, such impression would fully account for the disdainful contempt manifested by the correspondent of M. Joshua.

Rodin was playing a deep and hazardous game, and while feigning to mutter to himself words and threats likely to intimidate the Mulatto, he still, while assuming a wrathful and offended air, stole furtive glances at his companion, and from the corners of his scowling eye perused in agonising anxiety the emotions depicted in the countenance of Faringhea, who, feeling quite sure of having penetrated to the secret motives of Rodin's behaviour, said,—

"Well, I go—but one word first: you think I am uttering a lie?"

"I am convinced of it; you have been trying to deceive me by a tissue of romancing falsehoods. I have already lost too much time in listening to you, excuse me from hearing any more—it is late—I wish to be alone. Once more, I bid you begone!"

"One minute!—you are a man, I perceive," said Faringhea, "from whom it is useless to conceal any thing. I have nothing to hope or expect from Djalma but charity or sovereign contempt, for to say to a person of his character and high sense of honour, 'Reward me largely, because when I had it in my power to betray you I did not do so,' would be to incur both his anger and contempt. I might have killed him twenty times, but his hour is not yet come," continued the Strangler, in a gloomy tone, "and to await that day, and many others equally fatal, I must have gold, much gold; you alone can pay me the price of my treachery to Djalma, because you alone will profit by it. You refuse to listen to me because you look upon me as an impostor and as one who speaks lies: look here, this is the address of the inn we are staying at, which I took the precaution to write down; send some one to the place to ascertain how far I have asserted the truth—you will believe me then: but the price I demand for my treachery will be a great one. I told you, you know, brother, I should ask much of you."

With these words Faringhea offered a written address to Rodin, but, although following from the corner of his eye every movement of the Mulatto, the socius feigned to be so entirely lost in thought as not to hear him, and, therefore, made no reply to this speech.

"Take this address," persisted Faringhea, "and satisfy yourself as to whether I speak truth or falsehood—here, take the paper," continued he, again presenting the address to Rodin.

"I beg your pardon," said the latter, affecting to be roused suddenly from his fit of abstraction, "did you make any observation? I really did not hear you; what were you saying?" continued he, casting a side glance at the paper until he had made himself master of its contents, although his fingers made no effort to touch it.

"Read this address," repeated the Mulatto, "that you may be well convinced ——"

"Upon my word, sir," cried Rodin, indignantly putting back the offered paper, "your impudence passes all belief! I tell you again, and for the last time, I neither know nor wish to know any thing of you or about you, any more than I am acquainted with this Prince Djalma you talk about, although I must candidly state my disbelief of there being such a person in existence. You have it in your power to injure me, you say; I beg you will stand upon no ceremony, but precisely follow up your own inclinations in the matter. One thing I beg of you, and that is for the love of Heaven quit this room, and thereby free me from any further endurance of your company." So saying, Rodin rang the bell violently.

Involuntarily Faringhea assumed an attitude of defence, as though he expected to be seized and overpowered. An old servant, with an amiable, placid-looking countenance, appeared at the door in answer to the summons.

"La Pierre," said Rodin, pointing to Faringhea, "shew this gentleman out."

Still more and more bewildered at the calm immovable air and manner of Rodin, the Strangler appeared alarmed and uneasy, and hesitated to quit the room.

"Well, sir," said Rodin, observing his evident perplexity and apprehension, "what are you waiting for? I told you I wished to be alone."

"Then," muttered Faringhea, slowly, retreating backwards to the door,—"then you refuse my offers? Take care—to-morrow it will be too late."

"Sir, I have the honour to wish you good evening," said Rodin, bowing with extreme politeness.

The Strangler quitted the apartment.

As the door closed upon him, D'Aigrigny appeared from the adjoining chamber, his countenance pale and convulsed with agitation.

"What have you done?" exclaimed he, addressing Rodin. "I have heard all, and, unhappily, am but too well convinced the villain who has just left you speaks the truth,—the Indian is in his power, as he says, and, doubtless, he will return to him to put his threat into execution."

"I think not," answered Rodin, with a deferential bow, his features resuming their usual air of submissive servility.

"What will hinder him from rejoining the prince?"

"Permit me to explain. I recognised this atrocious miscreant the moment he entered the apartment, and before I began my conversation with him, I despatched a few lines to Morok, who, with Goliath, was waiting your reverence's leisure in the back room. Afterwards, when I found the turn events had taken, I despatched fresh instructions to Morok, whose reply to my first missive signified his being fully prepared to follow out any directions I might give him."

"And what does this avail since the man has quitted the house?"

"Your reverence will have the goodness to remember that he did not depart till, thanks to my feigned abstraction, I had had abundance of time to possess myself of all I required further from him, namely, the address of the hôtel where the Indian now is. Even had I not succeeded, Faringhea would have fallen just the same into the hands of Morok and Goliath, who were waiting for him in the street a few doors off. Still we should have been greatly embarrassed from not knowing the residence of Prince Djalma."

"Still violence!" said D'Aigrigny, with an air of repugnance.

"'Tis much—very much to be regretted," replied Rodin. "I could, not, however, think I erred in pursuing a system hitherto unhesitatingly employed."

"Is that intended as a personal reproach?" said D'Aigrigny, beginning to suspect for the first time that Rodin was not the mere mechanical automaton he had hitherto affected to be.

"Your reverence must be quite assured neither my duty nor respect would permit me to presume so far," answered Rodin, bowing almost to the ground. "I merely acted so as to secure this man from doing us any injury during the next twenty-four hours."

"But afterwards he will, doubtless, complain of the violence used towards him, and seek redress."

"A wretch like him so loaded with crimes will not dare seek the protection of the laws; besides, what can he urge against us? He quitted this house free and unmolested. After Morok and Goliath have overpowered him, they will bandage his eyes. There is another entrance to this dwelling from the street Vielle des Ursins; at this hour and during the present stormy weather no persons ever pass through this deserted neighbourhood; the blindfolded traitor will be completely bewildered as to the road he is taken or the distance he is conveyed—he will be carried into an empty cellar, and to-morrow night he will be set at liberty with the same precautions. As for the Indian, since we now know where to find him, it will be necessary to despatch a confidential person to him immediately, and should he recover from his stupor, why there is a very safe and, according to my poor judgment, a very innocent mode of keeping him from the Rue Saint François throughout the whole of to-morrow," said Rodin, humbly.

The same pleasant-looking domestic who had admitted Faringhea, and afterwards conducted him to the door, now entered the apartment, after having twice knocked gently at the door; he carried in his hand a small leathern wallet, which he gave to Rodin, saying,—

"M. Morok has just brought this; he came in by the entrance from the Vielle Rue."

Directly the servant had quitted the room Rodin opened the bag, from which he took the contents, naming them to D'Aigrigny as he held them up to view.

"Your reverence perceives," said Rodin, with an expression of meek satisfaction on his cold impassive features, "that my scheme has succeeded well; here are the medal, and packet of papers despatched to us by M. Joshua. Oh! Morok is a skilful and expeditious ally!"

"Thus, then, we escape another fearful danger," said the marquis; "still it is to be lamented that we cannot accomplish our object without employing such means."

"The blame rests with the wretched creature who made it impossible for us to use any other. I will this instant send some one on whom we can depend to the hôtel of Prince Djalma, and at seven o'clock in the morning you will conduct Gabriel to the Rue Saint François; the interview he has so earnestly begged for during the last three days shall take place there. I have instructed him to that effect this evening, and he will attend you there according to your orders."

"Now, then," said D'Aigrigny, "after so many struggles, fears, and difficulties, a few hours only intervene between the present time and the period so ardently expected."

* * * * *

We shall now conduct the reader to the house in the Rue Saint François.

PART VI.

“THE THIRTEENTH OF FEBRUARY.”

CHAPTER II.

THE HOUSE IN THE RUE SAINT FRANÇOIS.

ANY person who (at the period of our history) should chance to enter the Rue Saint Gervois by the Rue Doré (in the Marais) would find himself immediately opposite an enormously high wall, built of stones, now black and almost porous with age. This wall, extending nearly the whole length of the street, served as a support to a terrace shaded with trees of many centuries' growth, flourishing in a soil raised at least forty feet above the pavement. Through their thick branches might be discerned the stone front, peaked roof, and high brick chimneys of an ancient mansion, whose entrance was No. 3 in the Rue Saint François, not far from the corner of the Rue Saint Gervois. Nothing could be imagined more gloomy than the exterior of this house. The high stone wall was also continued in the Rue Saint François; its massive sides were here pierced with occasional loop-holes, strongly barricaded with bars of iron. An entrance-gate, or porte cochère, of solid oak banded with iron, closely studded with immense nails, whose primitive colour had long disappeared amidst the thick coating of mud and rust, heaped on from year to year, terminated in a sort of arched top, and served as the entrance to a large court resembling a vast arcade, so thick and strong were the walls. In one of these ponderous gates was a small wicket, which served to afford ingress or egress to the Jew Samuel, the keeper of this desolate abode.

Passing the threshold of the entrance-gates, the visitor found himself in a species of deep arch, formed by the thickness of the outer walls. In this entrance was the lodge belonging to Samuel, the windows of which opened upon an inner court of considerable extent, terminated by an iron gate, through which a garden was visible.

In the midst of this garden stood a stone mansion, two stories in height, but raised so singularly above the ground that it was necessary to ascend a flight of twenty stone steps (or rather a double staircase) to reach the entrance-door, which had now been bricked-up for the last hundred and fifty years.

The shutters belonging to this habitation had been removed and their place supplied by large thick sheets of lead, hermetically soldered and secured by iron bars, let into the stone-work, and securely riveted. And still further to exclude both light and air, as well as to guard against every inroad from time or weather, either within or without, the whole of the roof had been covered with thick sheets of lead, as well as the openings of the high chimneys, which had been previously filled up and bricked over.

The same means had been adopted to preserve and enclose a small square belvédér, built on the top of the house, the whole of its glazed sides, as well as summit, being covered over with lead, securely soldered down to that on the roof; but, by some strange caprice, each side of the leaden covering masking the windows of the belvédér, which corresponded with the four cardinal points, was pierced with seven small round holes, disposed in the form of a cross, and which were distinctly visible from the outside.

The windows in every other part of the house were closely covered with sheets of lead, admitting not the least air or light; and, thanks to the precautions taken, joined to the solidity of the building, it had scarcely required any repairs during the long period it had thus been deserted, while it was more than probable that the interior would be found as perfectly uninjured by the years which had passed away as the exterior, and the apartments almost as intact as though just quitted by their late occupants. Yet dilapidated walls, worm-eaten and decayed shutters, a roof half-fallen in, and windows whose panes were supplied by the thick ivy and other parasitical plants, could scarcely have presented an aspect so chilling, so awe-inspiring, as did this solid stone structure, wrapped in its leaden covering and bound so securely in its hard iron fastenings, looking as though it were one huge tomb.

The garden had fallen into utter decay, and, except when Samuel the keeper of the premises took his daily round, was untrodden by human foot, and presented, especially during summer, a confused mass of parasitical plants, mingled with weeds and briars. The trees, left to themselves, had grown in wild luxuriance, and interwoven their branches in various fantastic forms; the vines, however stunted themselves, had sent up young shoots, which, at first prostrate on the ground, had by degrees approached the foot of some tall tree, then climbing up the stem, had boldly thrown themselves around the branches, from which they hung in long fantastic wreaths, flinging themselves also across the pathway, and holding the arms of their opposite neighbours in the inextricable embrace of their twining tendrils.

The only means of penetrating this wilderness was by a path kept free by Samuel, in order to admit of his going from the gate to the house, whose broad approach, forming a gradual descent to carry off the water, was well flagged, and presented a walk of about ten feet in width impervious to damp.

Another path round the encircling walls was nightly watched and kept by two or three enormous Pyrenean dogs, whose faithful race had been perpetuated in this house for upwards of a century and a half.

Such was the habitation destined for the re-assembling of the Rennepont family.

The night which divided the 12th from the 13th of February had nearly ended.

Calm had succeeded to storm: the rain had ceased—the vault of heaven shone with its many stars—the moon ere it set glittered in silvery brightness, and beamed in mournful majesty on the dull, death-like spot, while its soft rays fell on the threshold of that building no human foot had passed for more than a century and a half.

A bright light streaming from the windows of the lodge announced that old Samuel the guardian of the place was up and watching.

Let the reader imagine an apartment of ample size, wainscotted from top to bottom with walnut-tree wood, now reduced from its once rich brown to nearly black by age and service; two half-burnt logs of wood lay on the hearth, amidst a mass of extinguished cinders; on the chimneypiece, which was painted in imitation of grey marble, might be seen an old iron candlestick, with a small candle in it, surmounted by an extinguisher; near these lay a pair of double-barrelled pistols, and a small sword highly polished and sharpened—the handle of the weapon, composed of carved bronze, belonged to the seventeenth century,—while against one side of the chimney stood a heavy gun.

Four stools without backs, an old oaken closet, and a square table upon twisted legs, formed the sole articles of furniture contained in this apartment. Against the wall were arranged in symmetrical order a variety of keys of various sizes, whose form announced the antiquity of their workmanship; each key bore its own descriptive label affixed by a small ring.

The bottom of the old oaken cupboard, which was a sliding and secret one, had been pushed back, and displayed fixed in the wall a large deep iron box, whose open lid exhibited the wondrous mechanism of one of those Florentine locks in use during the sixteenth century, which so completely surpassed all modern inventions, as regarded the impossibility of their being broken into; and which was still further protected, according to the custom of the time, by a thick lining of asbestos, kept at a distance from the case itself by threads of gold, which rendered the objects it contained incombustible in case of fire.

A large casket of cedar-wood taken from this iron chest, and placed upon a stool, was filled with numerous papers carefully arranged and labelled. By the light of a brazen lamp the old keeper of the place, Samuel, sat writing in a small account-book, while Bathsheba, his wife, dictated from a ledger she read aloud.

Samuel was about eighty-two years of age, yet, spite of his advanced period of life, a thick mass of grey hair covered his head; he was small, thin, though muscular; and the involuntary impatience of his manner proved that years had neither diminished his energy nor activity, spite of the impression prevalent in the neighbourhood, where he very rarely appeared, and when compelled to do so, always assumed that appearance of childish old age which Rodin had described to D'Aigrigny. An old dressing-gown of maroon-coloured barracan, with loose hanging sleeves, entirely enveloped the old man, and fell in long folds to his feet.

The features of Samuel were a pure specimen of the race from which he sprung ; his complexion was pale and sallow ; his nose aquiline ; his chin covered with a venerable beard, the same colour as his hair ; his sharp projecting cheekbones contrasted strongly with his hollow wrinkled cheeks ; his physiognomy expressed at once acuteness, intelligence, and sagacity ; his large elevated forehead betokened a mind firm, frank, and upright ; his eyes were black and sparkling, as those of an Arab, and had a look of mingled gentleness and firm penetration.

His wife, Bathsheba, his junior by fifteen years, was tall, and dressed in deep mourning ; a flat head-dress of stiffened lawn, recalling the grave style worn by Dutch matrons, gave a look of chastened melancholy to her pale and severe countenance, which must once have possessed uncommon beauty, of a holy and devotional cast ; the few wrinkles time had yet planted on her clear forehead appeared as though they proceeded from the contraction of her thick grey eyebrows, and abundantly testified the bitter load of grief with which she seemed continually oppressed.

At the present moment the features of Bathsheba seemed impressed with the most acute and poignant misery ; her eye was fixed, her head bent forwards and drooping on her breast ; her right hand, in which she held the small ledger she had been reading from, fell listlessly on her lap, while with her other hand she convulsively grasped a thick tress of jet-black hair she wore round her neck ; this plait of hair was fastened by a golden clasp of about an inch square, covered on one side with a piece of glass, beneath which was a morsel of folded linen almost saturated with a deep red colour, resembling blood, that had been a long time dried.

After a moment's silence, during which Samuel continued to write in his account-book, he said, while reading aloud what he had just written,—

“Per contra, 5000 shares in the Austrian mines, at 1000 florins, bearing date 19th October, 1826.”

Looking towards his wife as he completed his enumeration, Samuel added,—

“Is that correct, Bathsheba ? have you compared it with the entry in the ledger ?

But Bathsheba heard him not.

Astonished at her silence, Samuel turned to inquire the reason, but perceiving the deep affliction she seemed to endure, he anxiously and tenderly cried,—

“What ails you, wife of my bosom ? what troubles you, my Bathsheba ?”

“The 19th October, 1826 !” said she, slowly, her eyes still fixed, and her hand tightly pressing the long tress of raven hair she wore around her neck ; “’tis a fatal date, Samuel ; oh, most fatal ! ’tis that of the very last letter we ever received from ——”

Bathsheba could proceed no further ; uttering a deep groan of anguish, she concealed her face with her hands.

“Ah ! I understand you,” replied the old man, in a voice trembling with emotion ; “a father may, perhaps, throw off his sorrows amid the pre-occupying cares of the world ; but a mother’s heart never forgets ——”

And, throwing his pen down on the table, Samuel leaned his hoary head upon his hands, while his aged frame shook with the deep internal anguish he endured.

Bathsheba, as though relieved by dwelling on the frightful recollection of her grief, resumed the conversation, by saying,—

“Yes, that date marks the fatal, miserable day on which our child, our beloved son Abel, last wrote to us, announcing that he had just employed the money entrusted to him to take to Germany according to your orders, and that he was about to remove to Poland, in order to embrace a favourable opportunity that presented itself of making money there —”

“And in Poland,” interrupted Samuel, “he died the death of a martyr. Without being able to produce either proof or reason for supposing such a thing—and never was a more false accusation made—he was unjustly accused of having entered the kingdom for the purpose of organising a system of smuggling; and the Russian governor, treating him as all our brethren are treated in that land of savage brutality, condemned him to the fearful punishment of the knout, and that without deigning either to see or hear him. But what would have been the use of hearing a Jew? What is a Jew, but a poor degraded wretch, many degrees lower in the scale of creation than the meanest serf? Do they not reproach them in that country, and taunt them with the very vices engendered by the servile bondage in which they are held? Who would deem it worth while even to inquire the name of the Jew perishing beneath the whip of the executioner?”

“And so perished our good, our noble-minded, generous Abel,—scourged to death by a common executioner, dying as much from shame at the ignominy cast upon his tribe as from the severity of the punishment inflicted,” said Bathsheba, shuddering, as though the chill hand of death passed over her. “With much difficulty one of our brethren obtained permission to inter the mangled remains, carefully cutting off his long dark hair; and this tress of hair, and piece of linen spotted and saturated with the blood of our darling boy, is all I have left to remind me that I was once a mother!” So saying, the distracted woman convulsively kissed and pressed to her heart the mournful relics so piteously described.

“Alas!” cried Samuel, drying the tears which had flowed freely during these heart-rending recollections, “at least the mercy of the Lord was shewn, in that He took not our son till the task was well-nigh accomplished our family have faithfully performed for upwards of a century and a half, until now our end is almost achieved—our mission ended. What further use can our race be henceforward on the face of the earth?” continued Samuel, with concentrated bitterness. “Does not this chest contain more than royal treasures? and will not the mansion, walled and closed up for 150 years, be opened to receive the descendants of him who was so greatly the benefactor of my progenitors?”

As Samuel pronounced these words he looked towards the house, which could be distinctly seen from his window. Day was just beginning to dawn, the moon had set, and the belvédér, with the roof and chimneys, stood out in bold relief against the star-besprinkled firmament. All at once the old man turned very pale, and, rising from his seat, said to his wife, in a voice tremulous with emotion, as he pointed to the house,—

“Look, Bathsheba! see,—the seven points of light as they appeared thirty years ago! Look, look!!”

And so it was; the seven round openings in the form of a cross, pierced in the lead which covered the windows of the belvédér, emitted so many rays of bright light, which sparkled and glittered with distinct radiance, as though some person had ascended to the very roof of the shut-up and deserted house.

CHAPTER III.

“THE 13TH OF FEBRUARY.”—DEBITS AND CREDITS.

FOR some moments Samuel and Bathsheba remained motionless, with their eyes fixed in fear and disquietude on the seven luminous points, which shone out amongst the latent darkness of the night from the summit of the belvédér, whilst in the horizon behind the house a pale rose-coloured streak announced the coming dawn.

Samuel first broke this silence, and, passing his hand over his brow, said to his wife,—

“The grief which the recollection of our poor boy has caused us has prevented us from remembering and recalling to our ourselves that, after all, there is nothing in this which should cause us any alarm.”

“What mean you, Samuel?”

“Did not my father tell me that he and my grandfather had often seen such lights at long intervals?”

“Yes, Samuel; but they were unable, as well as ourselves, to explain the cause of these lights.”

“But, like my father and my grandfather, we may suppose that a passage, unknown to them as to us, serves for some persons who have also some mysterious duty to fulfil in this abode. More than once my father told me not to trouble myself about these singular occurrences, of which he spoke to me, and which now appears again for the second time in thirty years.”

“Yet, Samuel, it makes us as much alarmed as if it were something supernatural.”

“The age of miracles is passed,” said the Jew, shaking his head mournfully. “Many of the old mansions in this quarter have subterranean communications with distant places: some, they say, extend as far as the Seine, and even to the Catacombs. No doubt this house is so constructed, and the persons who come so seldom introduce themselves by this way.”

“But the belvédér thus lighted ——”

“From the drawn plan of this building, you know that the belvédér forms the roof or lantern of what is called ‘The great chamber of mourning,’ which is situated in the bottom floor of the house. As it must be in entire darkness in consequence of all the windows being closed, why, necessarily, a light must be employed for any one to get an entrance into the mourning chamber—an apartment in which they say that there are very strange and very awful things," added the Jew, shuddering.

SAMUEL AND BATHSHEBA

Bathsheba looked attentively, as did her husband, at the seven luminous points, whose brightness diminished in proportion as the dawn advanced.

"As you say, Samuel, this mystery may be thus explained," replied the wife of the old man; "and, moreover, to-day is so important a day for the Rennepont family, that under such circumstances the appearance need not surprise us."

"And then," said Samuel, "for a century and a half these lights have appeared several times! Is there then another family which, from generation to generation, is devoted like our own to accomplish a pious duty?"

"But what is that duty? Perhaps to-day all will be cleared up."

"It has come—it has come, Bathsheba!" said Samuel, suddenly, and throwing off his reverie, as if he reproached himself with his indolence—"the day has arrived, and before eight o'clock I must have my cash account all arranged, and this immense list of property duly classed," and he pointed to the large cedar-wood chest, "in order that they may be placed correctly in the hands of those who have a right to them."

"You are right, Samuel; and to-day does not belong to us: it is a solemn day, and one that will be happy—ah, very happy for us!—if, indeed, we could ever again be happy," said Bathsheba, sadly, and thinking of her son.

"Bathsheba," said Samuel, mournfully, and taking his wife's hand, "we shall at least be sensible of the deep satisfaction of having done our assigned duty. Has not the Lord been exceedingly favourable unto us, although we have been sorely tried by the death of our son? Is it not through His gracious providence that three generations of my family have begun, continued, and completed this great work?"

"Yes, Samuel," said the Jewess, affectionately; "and, at least for you, there will be calm and repose united with this satisfaction, for when the hour of noon hath stricken you will be delivered from a fearful responsibility!" And, as she spoke, Bathsheba pointed to the cedar coffer.

"True!" said the old man. "I would rather know that these immense riches were in the hands of those to whom they of right belong than that they were in mine; but to-day I shall not remain the sole depositary. I will, then, for the last time, superintend the condition of these properties, and we will check and cast them by my register and the debt-book which you keep."

Bathsheba made an affirmative nod with her head, and Samuel, taking up his pen, gave all his attention to his pecuniary calculations; whilst his wife again abandoned her thoughts, in spite of herself, to the cruel recollections of her son's death, which a fatal period had recalled to her.

We will state correctly the simple, but apparently romantic and marvellous mode by which the 50,000 crowns, which, thanks to a careful and faithful accumulation and saving, had naturally, or rather forcibly, been converted at the end of a century and a half into a sum much more important than the 40,000,000 (of francs) calculated by D'Aigrigny, who, imperfectly informed on this subject, and reflecting, moreover, on adverse circumstances, losses, and bankruptcies, which for so many years had, as he believed, affected the successive depositaries of these properties, still considered as enormous the sum of 40,000,000. (1,600,000*l.*)

The history of this fortune, of necessity united with that of the Samuel family, which had accumulated these funds for three generations, we will give in few words.

About 1670, several years before his death, M. Marius de Rennepont, during a journey to Portugal, had, by powerful influence, saved the life of an unfortunate Jew, condemned to the stake by the Inquisition for his religious creed.

This Jew was Isaac Samuel, the grandfather of the guardian of the house in the Rue Saint-François.

Generous men often attach themselves more closely to those they have obliged than the obliged attach themselves to their benefactors. Being first convinced that Isaac, who was in business in Lisbon as a money-changer on a small scale, was honest, active, industrious, and intelligent, M. de Rennepont, who then had vast property in France, proposed to the Jew to accompany him, and take the superintendence of his estates, &c. The inveteracy and mistrust with which the Jews have always been persecuted were then at their height, and Isaac was, therefore, doubly grateful for the marks of confidence which M. de Rennepont testified.

He accepted his offer, and vowed to devote his existence henceforward to the service of him who, after having saved his life, had faith in his honesty and integrity, though he was a Jew, and belonged to a race so generally suspected, hated, and despised. M. de Rennepont was a noble-hearted man, with strong sense and a powerful mind, and he was not deceived in his choice. Until he was stripped of his possessions they thrived enormously in the hands of Isaac Samuel, who, endued with a peculiar aptness for affairs, applied himself exclusively to the interest of his benefactor.

Then ensued the persecution and ruin of M. de Rennepont, whose wealth was confiscated and given up some days before his death to the R. R. P. P. of the Company of Jesus, who had informed against him. Concealed in the retreat which he had selected as the spot wherein he would end his days violently, he had sent for Isaac Samuel secretly, and given him 50,000 crowns, all that remained of his once extensive property, and desired this faithful servant to make such use of this sum as he could, by saving and placing it out to interest; and if he had a son, to hand down to him the same obligation; and, in default of a son, he was to find some honest relative who would continue the charge, always liable to a certain salary: this trust was to be transmitted and handed down from one kinsman to another until the expiration of a century and a half. M. de Rennepont had, moreover, begged Isaac to be, during his life, the guardian of the house in the Rue Saint-François, in which he was to reside rent free, and to hand down these conditions to his descendants if it were possible.

If Isaac Samuel had had no children, the powerful bond of union which often unites certain Jewish families would have enabled him to comply with the last wishes of M. de Rennepont. The relatives of Isaac were attached by his gratitude to his benefactor, and they and their successive generations would have religiously accomplished the task imposed on one of their people: but Isaac had a son many years after the death of M. de Rennepont.

This son, Levi Samuel, born in 1689, had no children by his first wife, but had married again at nearly sixty years of age, and, in 1750, had a son born, David Samuel, the guardian of the house in the Rue Saint-François, who, in 1832 (the date of this story), was eighty-two years of age, and promised to be as long-lived as his father, who died when he was ninety-three years old. We must add that Abel Samuel, the son, whom Bathsheba so bitterly deplored, born in 1790, had died, under the Russian knout, at the age of twenty-six.

Having detailed this humble genealogy, we may easily comprehend that the successive longevity of these three members of the Samuel family, who had been perpetual guardians of the walled house, and who thus united the nineteenth to the seventeenth century, had singularly simplified and facilitated the execution of the last wishes of M. de Rennepont, who had formally declared to the ancestor of the Samuels that he desired that the sum he left should not be augmented but by the simple interest of five per cent, in order that this fortune should reach his descendants free from any usurious speculation.

The co-religionaries of the Samuel family, the first inventors of letters of exchange, which served in the middle ages to transport secretly immense amounts from one end of the world to the other, to conceal their wealth, and place it beyond the reach of their rapacious enemies,—the Jews, be it said, had almost alone carried on the business of exchange and money from the close of the eighteenth century, and they greatly aided the secret transactions and financial operations of the Samuel family, who, in 1820, or thereabouts, placed all this wealth, which had gradually become enormous, in the banking-houses or exchanges of the richest Israelites in Europe. This sure and secret way of doing business had permitted the actual guardian of the Rue Saint-François to effect, unknown to any one, by simple deposits or letters of exchange, immense investments: for it was particularly during his control that the sum capitalised had acquired, by simple accumulation, an amount almost incalculable; his father, and particularly his grandfather, leaving him, in comparison with himself, but small funds to manage.

Although the only consideration was to find certain and ready means of employment, in order that the money should not lie idle for a moment, it yet required great financial abilities to reach this result, especially when it was a question affecting fifties of millions; yet this capability, Samuel, who had been well brought up by his father, displayed in an eminent degree, as we shall presently shew by the results we shall quote.

Nothing could be more touching, more noble, more worthy, than the conduct of the members of this Jewish family, who, united by the debt of gratitude incurred by one of their ancestors, had devoted themselves for so long a period of years with equal disinterestedness, discrimination, and fidelity, to the gradual accumulation of a fortune worthy of a monarch, of which they expected no share, and which, thanks to them, would be handed over intact and vast into the hands of the descendants of the benefactor of their ancestor.

Nothing, indeed, could be more honourable for the proscribed man who made the deposit, and for the Jew who received it, than this simple exchange of words, given and taken with no other guarantee than a reciprocal confidence and esteem, when it concerned a result which was only to arrive at the end of 150 years.

* * * * *

After having read his inventory, Samuel said to his wife, "I am certain of the correctness of my totals : will you now check them with your cash-book, which is beside you, and which details the sums which I have inscribed in the register? I will, at the same time, once more convince myself that the title-deeds and papers are classed in proper order in this strong box ; for this morning, when the will is opened, I must hand all over to the notary."

"Begin, and I will follow you," said Bathsheba.

And Samuel read the following account, checking it by his vouchers in the chest as he proceeded :—

BALANCE-SHEET OF ACCOUNT WITH THE HEIRS OF M. DE RENNEPONT, AS GIVEN IN BY DAVID SAMUEL.

"THE 13TH OF FEBRUARY."—DEBITS AND CREDITS.

23

DEBITS.	FRANCS.	CREDITS.
2,000,000 f. , in the French 5 l. per cent in inscriptions named, and to bearer, bought from 1825 to 1832 (as by other statements) at an average of 99 f. 50 c. .....	39,800,000	FRANCS.
900,000 f. French 3 l. per cent, by different purchases, for the same years, at an average of 74 f. 25 c. .....	22,275,000	150,000 f. received from M. de Rennepont by Isaac Samuel,
5000 shares in the Bank of France, bought at 1900 f. .....	9,500,000	my grandfather, and successively placed by him, my
3000 shares in four canals, and a certificate of deposit of the said shares with the company, bought at an average of 1115 f. .....	3,345,000	father, and myself, at interest at 5 l. per cent, with a
125,000 ducats of Neapolitan stock, at an average of 82 f. ; 2,050,000 ducats, at 4 f. 40 c. each .....	9,020,000	regular account of each six months as to capitalising the
5000 Austrian métalliques of 1000 florins, at an average of 93 f. , 4,650,000 florins, at an exchange of 2 f. 50 c. each .....	11,625,000	interests, which have produced, as by accounts and
75,000 l. sterling in the English 3 l. per cent, at 88 $\frac{3}{4}$ , 2,218,750 l. sterling, at 2 f. per pound sterling .....	55,468,000	vouchers, hereunto annexed, the sum of 225,950,000 f.
1,200,000 florins in 2 $\frac{1}{2}$ Dutch, at 60 f. ; 28,860,000 florins, at 2 f. 10 c. the florin of Pays-Bas .....	60,606,000	But there must be deducted, as by details an-
In cash, in bank-bills, gold, and silver .....	535,250	nexed, for losses by failures, for commis-
	212,175,000	sion, brokerage to sundry persons, and also salary to three generations of managers .....
		13,775,000
		— * 212,175,000

* Nearly 9,000,000*l.* sterling British.—E. T.

Paris, 12th February, 1832.

"Quite right," said Samuel, after having examined the letters contained in the cedar casket. "There rests, therefore, in hand, at the disposal of the heirs of the Rennepont family, the sum of 212,175,000 francs." And as the old man uttered these words he surveyed his wife with a proud and exulting look.

"Can it be possible?" cried Bathsheba, struck with astonishment. "I knew that you had immense sums in your hands, but I never could have supposed that 150,000 francs, left for 150 years, could ever have been the sole source of such an enormous fortune."

"And yet so it is, Bathsheba," replied Samuel, proudly. "You may suppose that my grandfather, father, and self, have exercised our utmost zeal and fidelity in well placing these sums; and it also required considerable skill and judgment to take advantage of the right moment in which to embark our splendid capital, to keep an untiring watch for the chances afforded by the times, political agitations, and commercial crises; but all this we had great facilities of doing, owing to our numerous business transactions with our brethren in all countries: but never have I or those belonging to me embarked one single sous in any matter that bore usurious interest. Nay, we have scrupulously preferred investing our funds where the profit deducible was even below that usually expected and legally permitted on all loans and money transactions. The positive commands of M. de Rennepont, as received by my grandfather, strictly enjoined this; and I should say, that never was fortune more legitimately or fairly acquired: but for this disinterested prohibition, we might, by taking advantage of several favourable circumstances, have materially increased its present amount."

"Gracious heavens!" exclaimed the wife, "is it possible?"

"Nothing more true, Bathsheba. Every one knows, that in fourteen years a capital is doubled by the simple accumulation and working of the interests arising at five per cent. Now then, reflect, that in 150 years there are ten times fourteen years—that the first 150,000 francs have been thus doubled and increased. What astonishes you will thus seem very simple. In 1682, M. de Rennepont confided to my grandfather 150,000 francs; this sum, capitalising as I have told you, had produced, in 1696, fourteen years afterwards, 300,000 francs. They were doubled in 1710, and produced 600,000 francs. After the death of my grandfather, in 1719, the sum reached nearly 1,000,000 francs; in 1738, to 2,400,000 francs; in 1752, two years after my birth, to 4,800,000 francs; in 1766, to 9,600,000 francs; in 1780, to 19,200,000 francs; in 1794, twelve years after the death of my father, to 38,400,000 francs; in 1808, to 76,800,000 francs; in 1832, to 153,600,000 francs; and now, in adding the interest to ten years, it must be at least 225,000,000 francs: but losses, defalcations, and unavoidable expenses, of which I have given a full and exact statement, have reduced the amount to 212,175,000 francs, in acknowledgments, vouchers, and value enclosed in this chest."

"Yes, now I understand," said Bathsheba, thoughtfully. "But what an astonishing thing is the power of accumulating; and what admirable stores for the future might be formed out of the feeble resources of the present day!"

"Such was, no doubt, M. de Rennepont's idea; for, according to my father, who heard it from my grandfather, M. de Rennepont was one of the greatest and cleverest men of his day," said Samuel, closing the cedar casket.

"Heaven grant that his descendants may be worthy of this almost regal fortune!" said Bathsheba, rising.

It was now broad day. Seven o'clock sounded from the neighbouring churches.

"The masons will soon be here," said Samuel, replacing his cedar casket in the iron chest, concealed behind the old oaken cabinet. "Like you, Bathsheba," said he, "I am anxious to know who are the individuals who will present themselves here to-day, as the descendants of M. de Rennepont."

Two or three strokes dealt by an iron hammer against the porte-cochère resounded through the house; the angry barking of the watch-dogs, as they replied to this unusual summons, increased the clamour.

"'Tis doubtless the masons," observed Samuel, "sent by the notary, with one of his clerks, to watch the opening of the house. Collect all the keys carefully together; see that their labels are all correct; and I will come and fetch them." So saying, Samuel, spite of his age, nimbly descended the staircase, approached the gates, and having, as a precautionary measure, opened the small wicket, saw three labourers dressed like masons, accompanied by a young man dressed in black,—

"What is your pleasure?" asked the Jew, before opening the gates, that he might be perfectly assured of the identity of the personages presenting themselves.

"I come from M. Dumesnil, the notary," replied the clerk, "to witness the opening of the walled-up door; here is a letter from my employer for M. Samuel, the person in charge of the premises."

"I am he, sir," answered the Jew: "have the goodness to put your letter in the box, and I will take it."

The clerk obeyed the directions given; but he shrugged his shoulders at what he deemed an absurd whim on the part of a suspicious old man.

Samuel opened the box, took out the letter, which he carried to the other end of the arcade, in order to be enabled to read it by the better light of day, carefully compared the signature with another letter of the notary's he carried in the pocket of his great-coat; then, as if perfectly satisfied, he chained up his dogs, and returned to admit the clerk with the masons by the large gates.

"What the devil is all this fuss about?" inquired the clerk as he entered; "why, you could not observe more ceremony if we were entering some fortified castle!"

The Jew bowed, but made no reply.

"Are you deaf, my old fellow?" bawled the clerk in his ears.

"No, sir," answered Samuel, "I am not!" Then, with a gentle and benignant smile, he drew the young man beyond the arch under which they were standing, and, pointing to the house, said,—

"There, sir, is the walled-up door you must open. You will also be required to wrench away the bars of iron and covering of lead from the second window on the right hand."

"Why not open all the windows?" demanded the clerk.

"Because such are the orders I received, when entrusted with the care of the premises."

"And who gave you these orders?"

"My father, who received them from his father, who was so directed by the master of the mansion. When I shall have ceased to be guardian here, and the property will have passed into other hands, the new proprietor will use his own pleasure in future orders and arrangements."

"All right," said the clerk, considerably surprised at what he heard: then, addressing the masons, he added, "Now, then, my worthies, just come here and listen a bit,—undo that door; and then wrench away the iron and lead coverings from the second window on the right."

While the workmen proceeded to execute their orders under the inspection of the notary's clerk, a carriage stopped before the portecochère, and Rodin, accompanied by Gabriel, entered the house in the Rue Saint-François.

CHAPTER IV.

THE HEIR.

SAMUEL opened the door to Gabriel and Rodin.

The latter said to the Jew,—

"You, sir, are the guardian of this house?"

"Yes, sir," replied Samuel.

"This gentleman, the Abbé Gabriel de Rennepont," said Rodin, pointing to his companion, "is one of the descendants of the Rennepont family."

"So much the better, sir," said the Jew, almost involuntarily, struck as he was with the angelic countenance of Gabriel, for the nobility and serenity of mind of the young priest was legible in his look, and on his pure and white brow, already encircled with a martyr's crown.

Samuel contemplated Gabriel with curiosity, mingled with kindness and interest; but, soon perceiving that his silent observation became embarrassing to Gabriel, he said to him,—

"M. l'Abbé, the notary will not arrive until ten o'clock."

Gabriel looked at him with a surprised air, and replied,—

"What notary, sir?"

"Père d'Aigrigny will explain that to you," said Rodin, hastily: and then, addressing Samuel, he added, "We are rather soon. Can we not wait somewhere for the arrival of the notary?"

"If you will be so good as come into my abode," said Samuel, "I will shew you the way."

"I thank you, sir,—most willingly," replied Rodin.

"Follow me, then, gentlemen, if you please," added the old man.

A few moments afterwards, the young priest and the socius, preceded by Samuel, entered into one of the rooms which the latter occupied on the ground-floor of the side of the house which was towards the street, and looked on to the court-yard.

"The Abbé d'Aigrigny, who has been M. Gabriel's tutor, will be here shortly, and inquire for us," added Rodin. "Will you be so good, sir, as conduct him hither?"

"I will be sure to do so, sir," said Samuel, leaving the room.

The socius and Gabriel remained alone.

The excessive gentleness which usually pervaded the handsome features of the missionary and endued them with so much attraction were, at this moment, succeeded by a remarkable expression of sadness, resolution, and sternness. Rodin, who had not seen Gabriel for some days, was deeply occupied with the alteration he observed in him, and which he had remarked in silence during their drive from the Rue des Portes to the Rue Saint-François.

The young priest wore, as usual, a long black cassock, which rendered the transparent pallor of his features the more conspicuous. When the Jew had left the room he said to Rodin, in a firm voice,—

"Will you tell me, sir, now, why for several days I have not been allowed to speak to his reverence, Father d'Aigrigny, and wherefore he has chosen this house to grant me this conversation?"

"It is impossible for me," said Rodin, coldly, "to reply to these questions. His reverence will be here shortly, and will no doubt explain to you. All I can tell you is, that our reverend father has this interview as much at heart as yourself; and, if he has selected this house for the conversation, it is because you have an interest in being here. You know that well, although you have affected some astonishment in hearing the guardian mention a notary."

So saying, Rodin fixed a scrutinising and unquiet look on Gabriel, whose face expressed nothing but surprise.

"I do not understand you," he replied to Rodin. "What interest can I have in being here in this house?"

"Once more, it is impossible but that you must know," replied Rodin, still fixing his eyes on Gabriel.

"I repeat, sir, that I am utterly ignorant of it," he responded, almost hurt at the obstinacy of the socius.

"Then what did your adopted mother come to say to you yesterday? Why did you venture to admit her without having first obtained the authority of the R. F. d'Aigrigny, as I learnt this morning? Did she not speak to you of certain family papers found on you when she discovered you?"

"No, sir," said Gabriel; "at that time the papers were handed by my adopted mother to her confessor, and subsequently they passed into the possession of the R. F. d'Aigrigny. For the first time for a long while I now hear these papers referred to."

"Then you pretend, that it is not on this subject that Françoise Baudoin came to converse with you yesterday?" replied Rodin, pertinaciously, and laying a slight emphasis on each word.

"This, sir, is the second time that you seem to doubt what I affirm," said the young priest, gently, repressing an impatient feeling. "I assure you that I speak the truth."

"He knows nothing," thought Rodin, for he knew well enough Gabriel's sincerity to have the least doubt after so positive a denial.

"I believe you," replied the socius; "but the idea occurred to me when I was trying to seek some motive strong enough to induce you to transgress the orders of the R. F. d'Aigrigny as to the close confinement which he had ordered you—a confinement which excluded all communication from without. Moreover, contrary to all the regulations of our house, you closed your door, which ought always to remain open, or half open, in order that the mutual surveillance which is prescribed to us may be rendered more easy. I could not account for your severe offence against discipline, but by the necessity of a very important communication with your adopted mother."

"It was to a priest, and not to her adopted son, that Madame Baudoin desired to speak," replied Gabriel, gravely; "and I considered it right to hear her: and if I closed my door it was because she was in the act of confession."

"And what had Françoise so pressing to confess to you?"

"That you will know presently when I tell it to his reverence, if he will allow you to be present to hear me," replied Gabriel.

The missionary said these words in a tone so decided, that a long silence ensued.

We will remind the reader that Gabriel had been, up to this time, kept by his superiors in the most complete ignorance as to the important family interests which demanded his presence in the Rue Saint-François. On the evening referred to, Françoise Baudoin, absorbed by her grief, had not thought of telling him that the orphans ought also to be present at the same meeting; and, had this occurred to her, the express commands of Dagobert would have prevented her from speaking of this circumstance to the young priest.

Gabriel was thus entirely ignorant of the family ties which bound him to the daughters of Marshal Simon, Mademoiselle Cardoville, M. Hardy, Prince Djalma, and Couche-tout-Nu. In a word, if he had been told, at that moment, that he was the heir of M. Marius de Rennepont, he would have believed himself the sole descendant of this family.

During the interval of silence which succeeded his conversation with Rodin, Gabriel looked through the windows of the room at the masons employed in taking down the stones that blocked up the door. This first operation terminated, they began to loosen and detach the iron bars which supported a sheet of lead on the exterior part of the door. At this instant the Père d'Aigrigny, introduced by Samuel, entered the apartment.

Before Gabriel had turned round Rodin had time to say, in a low voice, to the reverend père,—

"He knows nothing; and there is nothing to fear from the Indian."

In spite of his assumed calmness, the features of P. d'Aigrigny were pale and contracted, like that of a gamester who is on the point of seeing a game determined on which his very existence depends.

Up to this time every thing had favoured his schemes and the designs of the society, but still he could not think without dread of the four hours which had yet to intervene before the fated hour arrived.

Gabriel turned round, and the P. d'Aigrigny said to him, in an affectionate and cordial voice, going towards him with a smile on his lips, and extended hand,—

“My dear son, it has cost me much to refuse you until this moment the conversation you have requested since your return. It has been not less painful to order you into solitude for some days. Although I have no explanation to give you on the subject of the orders I have given, I yet wish you to understand that I have only been acting for your interest.”

“It is my duty to believe your reverence,” replied Gabriel, bowing.

The young priest felt, in spite of himself, a vague emotion of fear; for, up to the time of his departure for his mission in America, the P. d'Aigrigny, to whom he had made the formidable vows, which bound him irrevocably to the Society of Jesus, the Père d'Aigrigny had exercised over him that fearful influence which, emanating from despotism, compulsion, and intimidation, destroys all the powers of the mind, and leaves it inert, trembling, and terrified.

The impressions of early youth are ineffaceable, and it was for the first time since his return from America that Gabriel had met with the Père d'Aigrigny; and thus, although he did not experience any failure in the resolution he had made, Gabriel regretted that he had been unable, as he had hoped, to assume fresh strength from the unreserved conversation he had proposed having with Agricola and Dagobert.

Père d'Aigrigny knew mankind too well not to have observed the emotion of the young priest, and to have suspected the cause of it. This impression appeared to him a favourable augury; and he, in consequence, redoubled the suavity, tenderness, and amenity, reserving to himself, if it were necessary, the power to assume another mask. He said to Gabriel, as he sat down, whilst the young priest remained respectfully standing, as well as Rodin,—

“You desire, my dear son, to have an important conversation with me?”

“Yes, father,” said Gabriel, lowering his eyes, in spite of himself, before the sparkling and full grey eyes of his superior.

“I have also matters of the deepest interest to tell you. First listen to me, and then you shall speak.”

“I do listen, father.”

“It is now about twelve years, my dear son,” said the P. d'Aigrigny, affectionately, “since the confessor of your adopted mother, addressing himself to me, through the intervention of M. Rodin, called my attention towards you by speaking to me of the astonishing progress you were making in the school of the brotherhood. I learned that your admirable conduct, your gentle and modest character, your precocious understanding, were worthy of the utmost interest: from this moment our eyes were directed towards you. At the end of some time, seeing that your conduct still continued meritorious, it seemed to me that you deserved a better destiny than that of an artisan, and therefore your adopted mother was spoken to, and, by my interference, you were admitted gratuitously into one of the schools of our order, and thus a burden the less weighed upon the excellent woman who had adopted you; and a child who had already created such exalted expectations received from our paternal hands all the benefits of a religious education. This is so—is it not, my dear son?”

“Perfectly true, father,” replied Gabriel, lowering his eyes.

“As you grew up, excellent and rare qualities developed themselves in you,—your obedience, your gentleness, were admirable and exemplary. You made rapid advances in your studies. I was at that period ignorant of the career which you would ultimately adopt; but I was assured that, in whatever path your destiny might be cast, you would remain always a beloved son of the church. I was not deceived in my expectations; or, rather, my dear son, you have surpassed them. Learning, in friendly confidence, that your adopted mother ardently desired to see you take holy orders, you generously and religiously responded to the desires of that excellent woman to whom you owe so much. But, as the Lord is always just in His rewards, He has willed that the most touching proof of gratitude which you could give to your adopted mother should be also divinely profitable, since it leads you to enter amongst the members militant of our holy church.”

At these words of P. d'Aigrigny, Gabriel could not repress a movement when he recalled the bitter confidence of Françoise; but he restrained himself, whilst Rodin, standing up, and resting his elbow at the chimney-corner, continued looking at him with singular and concentrated attention.

Père d'Aigrigny resumed,—

“I will not conceal from you, my dear son, that your resolution filled me with joy. I saw in you one of the future lights of the church, and I was most desirous to see it burn in the midst of our society. Our trials, so hard, so painful, so numerous, you underwent courageously. You were judged worthy of belonging to us, and after having taken, at my hands, the irrevocable and sacred oath, which binds you to our society for ever, for the great glory of the Lord, you desired to answer to the appeal of our holy father, to the souls of good will, and to go and preach as a missionary* the Catholic faith amongst barbarians. Although it was most painful to us to separate from our dear son, yet we felt bound to accede to his pious desires, and you went forth a humble missionary, returning to us as a glorious martyr, and we were justly proud of having you amongst us. This rapid sketch of the past was requisite, my dear son, in order to arrive at what follows; for it was necessary, if the thing were possible, to unite still more closely the bonds that join you to us. Listen to me then attentively, my dear son, for this is confidential, and of the highest importance, not only for you, but also for our society —”

“Then, father,” exclaimed Gabriel, interrupting the P. d'Aigrigny, quickly, “I cannot—I ought not to hear you!”

And the young priest became deadly pale, and it was evident, from the alteration in his features, that a violent struggle was passing within him; but, soon resuming his first resolution, he raised his head and gave a steady look at P. d'Aigrigny and at Rodin, who gazed at him mute with surprise, and resumed,—

* The Jesuits recognise in missions only the initiative of the Pope with respect to their company.

THE HEIR.

"I repeat to you, father, that if it is respecting confidential matters of the company, it is impossible that I can hear you."

"Really, my dear son, you cause me great astonishment! What ails you? Your features are altered—you are deeply excited! Pray speak, and without fear. Why would you not hear me further?"

"I cannot tell you, father, until—until I have myself also referred rapidly to the past, such as I have now viewed it for some time. You will then comprehend, father, that I have no longer any right to your confidence, for very soon an abyss will, doubtless, separate us."

At these words of Gabriel it is impossible to paint the glance which Père d'Aigrigny and Rodin rapidly exchanged. The socius began to bite his nails, fixing his irritated and reptile gaze on Gabriel, whilst Père d'Aigrigny became livid, and his forehead broke out into a cold sweat. He asked himself with alarm if, at the moment he reached the goal, the obstacle would be raised by Gabriel, in whose favour all other obstacles had been got rid of.

There was desperation in the thought, yet the R. P. repressed his emotions admirably, remained calm, and replied, with affectionate unction,—

"I can never believe, my dear son, that you and I shall ever be separated by an abyss, if it be not the abyss of grief which I should experience from some severe trial of your health and salvation: but speak, I hear you."

"It is, indeed, some twelve years since, my father," resumed Gabriel with a firm tone, and becoming bolder as he proceeded, "that by your care I was received into a college of the Company of Jesus. I entered it affectionate, frank, and confiding, and here were all these, the best instincts of my youth, fostered. Thus, on the day of my arrival, the superior said to me, pointing to two lads a little older than myself, 'Those are the companions you will select, and you three will take exercise together. The rule of the house forbids two persons to converse together; the rule also requires that you should listen attentively to all your comrades say, in order that you may tell it to me again, for those dear children may, without knowing it, have bad thoughts, or meditate the commission of some faults: so, if you love your companions, you must tell me of their improper inclinations, in order that my paternal remonstrances may spare them punishment by preventing their faults. It is better to prevent than to punish.'"

"Such, most truly," said P. d'Aigrigny, "is the rule of our houses, and the language held to all the pupils who present themselves."

"I know it, father," resumed Gabriel, with bitterness; "and three days afterwards, poor, submissive, and credulous infant, I in my simplicity became the spy over my comrades, listening to and retaining their conversation, which I afterwards detailed to my superior, who praised my zeal. What I was compelled to do was unworthy, and yet, God knows, I believed that I was fulfilling a labour of charity. I was happy to obey the orders of a superior whom I respected, and to whose words, in my infantine faith, I listened as I should have listened to those of God. Afterwards, when one day I had been guilty of an infraction of the rule of the house, the superior said to me, ‘My child, you have deserved severe punishment, but you shall be forgiven if you can surprise one of your comrades in the same fault which you yourself have committed;’* and, for fear this blind obedience, this excitement to informing, based on personal interest, should, in spite of myself, appear hateful to me, the superior added, ‘I speak to you, my child, in the interest of the salvation of your companion, for if he escape punishment he will become habituated to evil with impunity, whilst, in surprising him in his fault, and drawing down on him a wholesome chastisement, you will have the twofold advantage of aiding in his salvation and of removing from yourself a punishment deserved, but for which your zeal in detecting your comrade will obviate the necessity.’”

“No doubt,” said Father d’Aigrigny, more and more alarmed at the language of Gabriel; “and, in truth, my dear son, all this is in strict conformity with the established rule of our colleges and the habits of the members of our society, WHO MUTUALLY DENOUNCE EACH OTHER FROM PURE BROTHERLY LOVE AND RECIPROCAL CHARITY, AND FOR THEIR GREATER SPIRITUAL ADVANCEMENT, MORE ESPECIALLY WHEN COMMANDED OR REQUESTED BY THE SUPERIOR FOR THE ADVANCEMENT OF THE GLORY OF GOD.”†

“I know it!” exclaimed Gabriel; “I well know that it was in the name of all that is good, pure, and holy, I was encouraged to do wrong!” *

“My dear son,” said D’Aigrigny, striving to conceal his rapidly increasing terrors beneath an appearance of wounded dignity, “these terms and mode of expression from you to me are, at least, somewhat strange!”

At this moment Rodin, quitting his leaning position beside the chimney-piece, commenced pacing the chamber with hurried step, biting his nails, as usual when greatly excited.

“I am pained, my dear son,” continued D’Aigrigny, “to be obliged to remind you that you are indebted to our order for the education you have received.”

“Yes, I am not likely to forget it,” replied Gabriel. “And what were the results of the evil lessons I received? Hitherto I had become a spy upon those of my own age from disinterested motives, but by the orders of my superior I had advanced another step in the unworthy task allotted me—I had become an informer, a treacherous tale-bearer, to escape a merited punishment! Yet such was my trusting, my humble confidence in the directions of those set over me, that I continued, in all innocence of heart and intention, to perform a doubly hateful part. Yet once, I must confess, tormented by vague scruples, the expiring efforts of a mind whose generous impulses were being stifled within me, I asked myself whether the charitable and religious motives ascribed as the aim of all these mean acts of spying and revealing were sufficient to absolve my conscience from the crime of committing them. I laid my doubts and fears before the superior, who answered, 'That it was for me to obey, not to scrutinise, and that to him alone belonged all the responsibility of my actions.'

* These obligations of espionage and abominable incentives to informing are the bases of the education given by the reverend fathers.

† These words are copied literally from the Constitutions des Jésuites, Examen-Général, vol. ii. p. 29. Edit. PAULIN.

"Go on, my son," said D'Aigrigny, yielding, in spite of himself, to a deep gloom and dejection. "Alas! I was right to endeavour, as I did, to oppose your voyage to America."

"And Providence decreed that in this new, free, and fertile country, a singular chance should open my eyes as to the past and present," exclaimed Gabriel. "Yes, it was in America that, quitting the sombre abode in which passed so large a portion of my youth, finding myself, for the first time, face to face with the Divine Majesty, in the midst of the immense forests I had traversed,—it was there that, awe-struck and overpowered before so much magnificence and grandeur, I took an oath." But—"interrupting himself, Gabriel resumed: "I will speak further of this oath hereafter; but, believe me," added the missionary, in a tone of deep sorrow, "it was a fatal, a miserable day, when I found myself compelled to mistrust and accuse those I had so long respected and venerated. Yes, father, you may believe me," pursued Gabriel, fixing his humid eyes on D'Aigrigny; "when I say, my grief and desolation of heart were not on my own account only."

"I know the excellence of your heart, my dear son," answered D'Aigrigny, whose hopes revived as he perceived the deep emotion of Gabriel. "I fear you have been led astray, but confide in us as your spiritual directors, and I trust we shall strengthen your faith, which unhappily appears shaken, and dissipate the darkness which obscures your view: for, alas! my son, in your illusion you have been induced to mistake some deceitful glimmerings for the pure light of day."

While D'Aigrigny was thus speaking Rodin stopped, took a pocket-book from his pocket, and wrote upon it a few lines.

Gabriel's countenance became paler and paler, while his emotion increased with each word he uttered; for, since his return from America, he had learned to know with what formidable power the sect from which he sought to separate himself were endowed: but this revelation of the past, seen through the medium of a more enlightened present, being the excuse, or rather the cause of the determination so boldly expressed by the young priest to his superior, made him desire, candidly and boldly, to speak out, however great might be the anger he incurred by so doing.

He therefore proceeded, in a voice tremulous with agitation,—

"You well know, father, that the close of my youth, that happy period of innocent affection and confiding light-heartedness, was passed by me in an atmosphere of constraining dread and mistrustful espionage. Alas! how was it possible for me to indulge in one moment's burst of confidence or tenderness, when I was constantly enjoined never to meet the eye of the persons to whom I spoke, lest they should be able to read on my countenance the impression their words might have made on me—to carefully conceal my own feelings, while I scrupulously observed and listened to all that was said or done in my presence? Thus I reached my fifteenth year. By degrees, the very few visits I had been permitted to pay (though always in the presence of one or other of the brothers of the community) to my adopted mother and brother were entirely suppressed, the better to shut my heart against every sweet and tender feeling ; dull and spiritless, I remained a close inmate of this gloomy abode, while I daily felt myself more completely separated from the loving, active world, I longed to mingle in, and to breathe the free air of unconstrained liberty. My time was divided between a mass of useless, mutilated studies, without either aim or end, and long tedious hours spent in the performance of religious minutiae and devotional exercises ; but I ask you, father, was any attempt ever made to kindle in our young hearts one spark of Christian love and benevolence by repeating words imbued with tenderness and heavenly goodness ? Alas ! no. Instead of that blessed command given by our gracious Redeemer, 'Love ye one another,' they seem to have substituted, 'Mistrust, suspect ye one another.' Did we ever hear the slightest reference made to our country, or the preservation of its liberty ? No !—oh no ! for such themes would have stirred up our youthful blood, and made our hearts beat with a vigour and animation unfit for such mere icy machines as ourselves to know or experience. To our hours of study and religious exercise succeeded, as the only recreation allowed, a measured monotonous walk of three abreast—never two ; because, with three, a mutual espionage might be carried on,* and because between two persons a friendship more easily springs up, and one of those noble and inspiring attachments might be cemented which makes the world cease to be dreary, and gives a quicker throb of pleasure to the heart. Heart ! What should the mere automata of others' wills have to do with hearts ? So, by continual suppression of every fond and generous feeling, I sunk into the mere machine my superiors desired to see me ; all feeling seemed stultified, gone ! During the last six months I had not once beheld either my brother or adopted mother ; at length they came to visit me in the college : a few years back, and my heart would have leaped with joy at their beloved presence, and I should have received them with tears and embraces ; but now my eyes were dry, my heart cold and insensible. My mother and brother quitted me heartbroken at the change they perceived in my whole manner ; the sight of their deep and affectionate grief pained me, even in spite of the apathetic indifference into which I had sunk, and I even felt horror-struck and alarm at the frigid insensibility I had permitted to take possession of me since I became an inhabitant of this living tomb. Terrified at the change wrought in myself, I wished to escape from the bonds that held me while there was yet time, I spoke to you, father, of the choice of some pursuit by which I might earn my bread ; for, during the time of my rousing from the cold thralldom in which coercion and restraint had plunged me, I seemed to hear from afar the hum of busy, happy life, the whisperings of dear and peaceful affections, pointing to domestic joys, the fruits of honest industry. Oh ! how my heart swelled at the bright visions thus conjured up, and how I longed for free, unfettered liberty of word and action ! how many noble impulses came rushing over my mind, bidding me shake off the mean, unworthy part, I was enacting, and rouse myself into the creature God intended man to be when He breathed into his nostrils the breath of life ! At last, I felt persuaded that, by so doing, alone should I ever regain the peace of mind and satisfaction of soul which seemed now to fly me more each day I dragged on my weary chain. I told you, father, while kneeling before you and bathing your knees with my tears, that I could be perfectly happy if permitted either to follow a military life or that of an artisan ; then it was you informed me that my adopted mother, to whom I owed my life (for she found a starving outcast, and, poor herself, divided with me the bread she laboured to obtain for her own child—the greatest sacrifice a mother could make)—then it was,” continued Gabriel, hesitating and looking downwards (for his was one of those noble natures which could feel called upon to blush and experience a sense of shame for the very acts of baseness and dishonour of which they themselves are the victims), “it was then, father,” continued Gabriel, with renewed embarrassment, “that you told me my adopted mother had but one end, one desire, which was ——”

* Such is the strictness of this regulation in all Jesuitical colleges, that if three pupils are walking together, and one of the party should quit his companions for an instant, the remaining two are obliged to remove at a distance from each other, beyond the reach of hearing each other's voice ; and so remain till the return of the third.

“That of seeing you take orders, my dear son,” replied D’Aigrigny, “since that good and pious woman believed that, by securing your salvation, her own would likewise be assured ; but that she durst not ask it of you, fearing lest you might suppose her desire arose from interested motives ——.”

“Enough, father !” said Gabriel, interrupting D’Aigrigny with a movement of irrepressible indignation. “It is most painful to me to hear you persist in such a misstatement — Françoise Baudoin never entertained such a wish !”

“My dear son,” replied D’Aigrigny, mildly, “you are somewhat hasty in your conclusions. I tell you, positively, that the sole thought and desire of your adopted mother was such as I have represented — that of seeing you enter holy orders.”

“Only yesterday, father, she told me all. Both she and I have been mutually deceived.”

“Then, my son,” said D’Aigrigny, in a stern voice, “it appears that you give the assertion of your adopted mother the preference over mine ?”

“I beseech you, father,” said Gabriel, casting down his eyes, “to spare me a reply as painful for you to hear as for me to utter.”

“Will you then explain,” said D’Aigrigny, anxiously, “what it is you mean to ——”

He was interrupted by the entrance of Samuel, saying,—

“There is a middle-aged person requesting to speak with M. Rodin.”

“I am M. Rodin,” answered the socius, much surprised. “I am much obliged to you for letting me know.”

Then, before he followed the Jew out, he gave to D’Aigrigny some words, written in pencil on a leaf torn from his pocket-book. Rodin then quitted the room, not a little disquieted, and wondering much who could be the person who had come in search of him to the Rue Saint-François.

D’Aigrigny and Gabriel were now left quite alone.

CHAPTER V.

RUPTURE.

PÈRE D'AIGRIGNY, plunged in a mortal anxiety, had mechanically received Rodin's note, and held it in his hand without thinking of opening it. He asked himself, with alarm, what conclusion Gabriel would arrive at, after all these recurrences as to the past. He dared not reply to his reproaches, as he feared to irritate the young priest, in whose heart at this moment rested interest so deeply important.

Gabriel could not possess any thing of his own, according to the constitution of the Society of Jesus, and, moreover, the R. P. had taken care to obtain from him, in favour of the order, an express renunciation of all the property which might at any time revert to him; but the commencement of this conversation seemed to announce so serious a modification of Gabriel's views, with respect to the society, that they might be resolved to break the ties which bound him thereto, and, in this case, he was not legally bound to fulfil any of his undertakings.* In fact, the act of donation was virtually annulled, and at the very moment of being so felicitously realised by the possession of the immense fortune of the Rennepont family, the hopes of the P. d'Aigrigny were completely and forever destroyed.

Amidst all the perplexities under which the R. P. had suffered during the time his hopes had been excited concerning this heritage, none had been more entirely unforeseen, more terrible.

Fearing to interrupt or question Gabriel, P. d'Aigrigny awaited in silent terror the result of this conversation, which threatened so much of ill.

The missionary resumed,—

"It is my duty, father, to continue this exposé of my past life up to the moment of my departure for America. You will understand directly why I impose this task upon myself."

P. d'Aigrigny made him a sign to continue.

"Once informed of the pretended desire of my adopted mother, I resigned myself to it at every sacrifice, and I quitted the gloomy walls in which I had passed a portion of my childhood and my early youth, to enter into one of the seminaries of the society. My resolution was not dictated by an irresistible vocation for the church, but from a desire to acquit a sacred debt to my adopted mother. However, the real spirit of Christ's religion is so full of inspiration, that I felt myself reanimated and excited by the idea of enforcing the adorable precepts and example of the Divine Saviour. In my thoughts, instead of resembling the college in which I had lived until then under strict discipline, a seminary was a blessed spot, where all that was pure and invigorating in an evangelic brotherhood was applied to common life ; where, for instance, they incessantly preached the ardent love of humanity, the ineffable sweetness of mercy and tolerance ; where they interpreted the immortal word of Christ in its most extensive signification, its fullest sense ; where, in fact, the mind was prepared by the habitual expansion of the most generous sentiments, for that glorious apostleship whose aim is to soften the rich and happy as to the anguish and sufferings of their fellow-men, by laying bare before them the fearful sufferings of afflicted humanity, — a sublime and holy morality, which none can resist when it is preached with the eyes full of tears and the heart running over with tenderness and love.”

* The statutes formally set forth that the company may eject from its bosom such members as it may consider useless or dangerous; but a member is not allowed to break the bonds which bind him to the company if the latter think it to their interest to retain him.

As he uttered these last words with deep emotion, Gabriel’s eyes were suffused with tears, and his face animated with angelic beauty.

“Such is in truth, my dear son, the spirit of Christianity ; but it must, before all things else, be studied and explained literally,” replied Père d’Aigrigny. “It is for this purpose that the seminaries of our company are especially devoted. The interpretation of the letter is a work of analysis, discipline, submission, and not a work of heart and sentiment.”

“I discovered that but too soon, father. On my entrance into this new house, I saw, alas ! all my hopes at once crushed ; my heart, momentarily expanded, soon again contracted, when, instead of the centre of life, affection, and youth, of which I had dreamed, I found in this seminary, so cold and chilling, the same repression of every generous impulse, the same unbending discipline, the same system of mutual betrayal, the same mistrust, the same invincible obstacles to every tie of friendship : thus, the warmth which had been momentarily excited in my soul was weakened, and I gradually fell into the habit of an inert, passive, and mechanical existence, which a pitiless authority regulated with mechanical precision, just as they would regulate the inanimate movements of a clock.”

“Because order, submission, and regularity, are the first principles of our society, my dear son.”

“Alas, father ! it was death, and not life, which was thus laid down in rules. In the midst of this destruction of every generous principle, I gave myself up to the studies of the schools and of theology. Gloomy and sinister studies they were ; cautious, menacing or hostile knowledge, which always excited ideas of peril, struggle, and warfare, and never produced thoughts of peace, progress, and liberty.”

“Theology, my dear son,” said Père d’Aigrigny, with a stern air, “is at once a buckler and a sword ; a buckler to defend and cover the Catholic faith—a sword to assail heresy.”

“Yet, father, Christ and His apostles were ignorant of this dark science, and yet at their simple and touching language men were regenerated, and liberty succeeded to bondage. The Gospel, that divine code, is surely sufficient to teach men to love one another. But, alas ! far from making us understand this language, they tell us but too constantly of religious wars, enumerating the seas of blood which have been necessarily shed, to be agreeable to the Lord to drown heresy. Such terrific instruction rendered my life still more gloomy. In proportion as we approached the term of youth our connexion with the seminary took a still more embittering character ; our jealousies and suspicions were always increasing. The habit of mutually informing against each other being applied to more serious matters, engendered bitter hatred and deep resentment. I was neither better nor worse than the rest: all broken for years to the iron yoke of passive obedience, debarred from all action, from all free will, humble and trembling before our superior, we alike presented a pale, mournful, and dejected appearance. At last I took orders; and, once become a priest, you induced me, father, to enter into the Company of Jesus; or rather, I found myself insensibly, and almost unconsciously, led to this determination—I know not how: for so long a time my will had not belonged to me. I underwent every examination; and the most terrible was decisive. For many months I lived in the silence of my cell, observing with resignation the strange and mechanical exercise which you had ordered to me, father. Except your reverence, no one approached me for a long space of time—no human voice but yours fell upon my ear: at night I sometimes experienced vague terrors: my mind, weakened by fasting, austerity, and solitude, was then impressed with frightful visions; at other times, on the contrary, I felt a depression, filled with a kind of quiescence, believing that by pronouncing my vows I should deliver myself for ever from the burthen of will and thought. Then, I abandoned myself to an overwhelming torpor, like those unfortunates who, surprised in a snow-storm, yield to the bewilderment of the cold, which results in homicide. I awaited the fatal moment; and then, father (according as the discipline ruled it), stifling in my agony,* I hastened the moment of accomplishing the last act of my expiring will: the vow of renouncing the exercise of my own will."

"Recollect, my dear son," said P. d'Aigrigny, pale, and a prey to his increasing agony of mind, "recollect that, on the eve of the day appointed for the taking your vows, I offered to you, according to the rule of the company, the privilege of renouncing your connexion with us, leaving you completely free, for we do not accept any but those whose call is voluntary."

"True, father," replied Gabriel, with painful bitterness; "when exhausted, overcome by three months of anxiety and trials, I was utterly prostrated, incapable of motion even, you opened the door of my cell, and said to me, 'If you desire it, rise and go forth—you are free to do so.' Alas! my strength had entirely left me, the sole desire of my soul, deadened and so long paralysed, was the repose of the tomb, and I consequently pronounced those irrevocable vows, and fell back into your hand a very corpse!"

"And up to this period, my dear son, you have never failed in your corpse-like obedience, as it was indeed termed by our glorious founder, because the more entire this obedience the more is it esteemed as meritorious."

After a moment's silence, Gabriel continued,—

"You had always concealed from me, father, the real ends of the society into which I had entered. The entire abandonment of my own will, which was to be subjected totally to my superiors, was demanded of me for the greater glory of God. My vows once pronounced, I was in your hands but a pliant and complying tool; but you told me that I should be employed in a holy, beautiful, and vast work; and, father, I believed you—how could I do otherwise? I waited, and then a sad event came to change my destiny—a severe illness, caused by ——”

* This expression is from the text. It is expressly desired by the constitution that this decisive moment of proof should be exhibited, and then to hasten the pronouncing of the vows.

“My son!” exclaimed D’Aigrigny, interrupting Gabriel, “it is useless to recall those circumstances.”

“Excuse me, father; but I must recall every thing. I have a right to be understood, and I will not pass in silence over any facts which have disclosed to me the immutable resolution which I have taken to announce to you ——”

“Speak, then, my son,” said Père d’Aigrigny, frowning, and evidently dreading to hear what the young priest was about to relate, whose cheeks, before pale as ashes, were now suffused with a scarlet blush.

“Six months before my departure for America,” replied Gabriel, lowering his eyes, “you informed me that I was destined for confession, and, to prepare me for this holy ministration, you gave me a certain book ——”

Gabriel again hesitated, and his cheek was still more deeply dyed with red. Père d’Aigrigny could hardly repress a movement of impatience and anger.

“You gave me a certain book,” resumed the young priest, making a strong and evident effort over himself—“a book containing questions which a confessor was to address to young men, young girls, and married women, when they presented themselves at the tribunal of penitence,” said Gabriel, shuddering at the recollection. “I shall never forget that fearful moment. It was in the evening. I retired to my chamber, carrying with me this volume, composed, as you had informed me, by one of our fathers—by a holy bishop.* Full of respect, of confidence and faith, I opened those pages. I was instantly seized and overwhelmed with shame, horror, and amazement. I could scarcely close that abominable volume with my trembling hand. I ran to you, my father, accusing myself for having involuntarily cast my eyes over

* It is impossible for us, out of respect to our readers, to give, even in Latin, an idea of this infamous book. M. Genin, in his bold and excellent work, Des Jésuites et de l’Université, says thus:—

“I feel great embarrassment in beginning this chapter; it treats of a book which it is impossible to translate, and difficult to quote literally, for the Latin braves decency with too much shamelessness. I must ask for the indulgence of the reader, and I promise, in return, to spare him as much of its obscenity as possible.”

Further, in alluding to the questions imposed by the Compendium, M. Genin exclaims, with generous indignation, “What, then, are the conversations which pass in the confessional between the priest and a married woman? I dare not speak more on this point.”

The author of Découvertes d’un Bibliophile, after having literally quoted a great number of passages from this horrible catechism, says,—

“My pen refuses to set down more amply this encyclopædia of all that is most foul. I have even a remorse, which alarms me, for having already gone so far. I say to myself in vain that I have only copied. I still feel the horror one has after having touched poison. Yet this my horror gives me courage. In the church of Jesus Christ, according to the admirable order established by God, the greater the evil when it is error, the more prompt, the more efficacious, the remedy. The holiness of morality cannot be endangered, but truth will raise its voice and will be heard.”

these nameless pages which, by mistake, you had placed in my hands ——”

“Again, recollect, my dear son,” said P. d’Aigrigny, with a serious air, “that I calmed your scruples by telling you that a priest, destined to know all under the seal of confession, must be told every thing, know every thing, in order to be able to appreciate every thing; that our company imposed the reading of this Compendium as a classic work for young deacons, to the seminarists, and the young priests destined for the confessional.”

“I believed you, father; for the habit of passive obedience was so powerful within me, discipline had so deprived me of all power of self-examination, that, in spite of my horror (with which I reproached myself as a serious sin), I took back the book to my chamber and read it. Ah, father! what a fearful disclosure was this of the criminal extent of luxury, so refined in its wickedness! I was in the vigour of life, and, until then, my ignorance and God’s help had alone sustained me in my fierce struggles against my senses. Oh, what a night!—what a night! as, in the deep silence of my solitude, shuddering with fright and confusion, I spelled over this catechism of monstrous, gross, and incredible debaucheries! As the obscene pictures of horrible lubricity presented themselves to my imagination, until then chaste and pure, you know my very reason seemed to fail me—yes, and completely left me; for, whilst I desired to flee from this infernal book, still devouring curiosity impelled me, breathless and distracted, to peruse these infamous pages, until I thought I should have died with confusion and shame.

“You speak of this work in blamable language,” said P. d’Aigrigny, with severity. “You have been the victim of a too lively imagination, and to that you must attribute this sad impression, produced by a work excellent and irreproachable of its class, and, moreover, authorised by the church.”

“And thus, father,” replied Gabriel, with deep bitterness, “I have not the right to complain that my imagination, until then pure and unsullied, has been for ever stained by monstrous ideas that I could never else have suspected, for I doubt if those who can abandon themselves to such horrors ever come to ask for absolution from a priest?”

“Those are questions of which you are not a competent judge,” replied D’Aigrigny, angrily.

“A tedious illness succeeded this terrific night, and often, as I was told, it was feared that my reason was destroyed. When I recovered, the past appeared to me as a painful dream. You told me then, father, that I was not yet fitted for certain functions. It was then that I asked you, with earnest entreaties, to allow me to go on a mission to America. After refusing my prayer for a long time, you consented, and I departed. From my infancy I had always lived, in college or the seminary, in a state of perpetual restraint and subjection, and, by force of accustoming myself to lower my head and eyes, I had, as it were, become unused to contemplate heaven and the splendours of nature; thus, then, what deep and holy joy did I experience, when I found myself all at once transported into the midst of the imposing grandeurs of the sea—when, during our voyage, I saw myself between ocean and sky! I seemed then to have left the thick and heavy darkness, and for the first time for many years I felt my heart beat freely in my bosom ! For the first time for many years I felt myself master of my faults, and I ventured to examine my past life, as from the height of a mountain one gazes into an obscure valley below. Then strange doubts arose in my mind. I asked myself by what right, for what purpose, my will, my liberty, and my reason, had so long been repressed and fettered down, since God had endued me with liberty, will, and reason ? but I said to myself that perhaps the ends of this great, beautiful, and holy work, to which I was bound, would one day be unveiled to me, and recompense me for my obedience and resignation."

At this moment Rodin returned.

Père d'Aigrigny inquired of him by a meaning look. The socius approached, and said in a low voice, so that Gabriel could not hear,—

"Nothing important: they only came to tell me that the father of General Simon had arrived at the manufactory of M. Hardy !"

Then, looking at Gabriel, Rodin seemed to inquire of P. d'Aigrigny, who looked down with a troubled air. However, recovering himself, he addressed Gabriel, whilst Rodin again leaned on his elbow against the chimney.

"Continue, my dear son, I am most desirous to know the resolution at which you have arrived."

"I will tell you instantly, father. I reached Charlestown. There the superior of our establishment, to whom I communicated my doubts as to the ultimate aims of our society, undertook to explain to me; and with fearful frankness he did disclose to me those aims to which tended, perhaps, not all the members of the company, for a great many shared my ignorance, but the aims which its chiefs have pertinaciously pursued since the foundation of the order. I was thunderstruck. I read the Casuists, and then, father, I had a new and fearful revelation, when, at each page of those books written by our fathers, I read excuses for justification of robbery, slander, violation, adultery, perjury, murder, regicide.* When I thought that I, a priest of God, of charity, justice, pardon, and love, belonged henceforward to a company whose chiefs professed such doctrines and glorified themselves thereat, I took an oath before God to break for ever the bonds that bound me to it!"

* This statement is quite within the bounds of truth. These are the extracts from the Compendium for the use of the seminaries, published at Strasbourg in 1843, under the title, Découvertes d'un Bibliophile: we shall find that the doctrine of the reverend fathers was sufficient to alarm Gabriel.

Perjury.

"It is asked how far a man is bound, who has taken an oath in a fictitious manner, and to deceive?"—ANSWER: "He is bound to nothing as regards religion; because he has not taken a real oath: but he is bound, by justice, to do what he has sworn in a fictitious manner, and to deceive."

Violation.

"He who, by force, threat, fraud, or importunity of his prayer, has seduced a virgin without any promise of marriage, is bound to indemnify the young girl and her parents from all the wrong which may result to them, by giving her a dowry, in order that she may marry; and by marrying her himself if he cannot indemnify her other-

At these words of Gabriel, Père d'Aigrigny and Rodin exchanged a look of terror: all was lost—their prey had escaped them!

Gabriel, deeply moved by the recollections he had awakened, did not perceive this movement of the R. P. and the socius, and continued,—

“In spite of my resolution, father, to leave the company, the discovery I had made was deeply distressing to me. Ah! believe me, for a just and good mind nothing is more frightful than to have to renounce that which it has long respected, and to sever from it. I suffered so greatly, that when I thought of the dangers of my mission I hoped, with secret joy, that God would recall me, perhaps, to himself under these circumstances; but, on the contrary, He has watched over me with providential care.”

As he said these words, Gabriel shuddered as he remembered the mysterious female who had saved his life in America. After a moment's silence he thus continued,—

“My mission terminated, I returned hither, further resolved to beseech you to restore me to liberty, to release me from my vows. Very frequently, but in vain, I have begged to have an interview with you: yesterday Providence vouchsafed that I should have a lengthened conversation with my adopted mother, from whom I learnt the stratagem that had been employed to compel me to take holy orders—one of the sacrilegious abuses which is made of confession by employing it to confide to other persons the orphans whom a dying mother had confided to the hands of a worthy soldier. You must underwise. If, however, his crime has remained absolutely a secret, it is more probable that, in conscience, the seducer is not bound to any reparation.”

Adultery.

“If any one has guilty intercourse with a married woman, not because she is married, but because she is handsome, thus obstructing the circumstance of marriage, this connexion, according to many authors, does not constitute the sin of adultery, but is only simple impurity.”

Suicide.

“A doctor orders a Carthusian, stricken with a serious malady, the use of meat, as a NECESSARY REMEDY TO AVOID CERTAIN DEATH; is he bound to obey his doctor?”—ANSWER: This question has been one of controversy: but a NEGATIVE decision appears to us most probable; and is, therefore, most general amongst the teachers.”

Robbery.

“Robbery is excusable when it constitutes a concealed compensation, by which the creditor carries off secretly the property of his debtor to an amount equal to what is due to him.”

Murder.

“It is certain that it is permissible to kill a robber to preserve possessions necessary to life; because, there the aggressor attacks not only our property, but indirectly our life also. But it is doubtful if it is permissible to kill him who unjustly attempts to carry off property of great importance not necessary to life, if this property cannot be defended with success. The affirmative appears most probable. The reason being, that charity does not require that any one should undergo a severe loss of his goods to preserve the life of his neighbour.”

As to regicides, read Sanchez, &c. &c. &c.

stand, father, that if I could have hesitated for a moment to break my bonds, what I learnt yesterday would have made my decision irrevocable. But, at this solemn moment, father, I must tell you that I do not accuse the whole company. There are many simple, credulous, confiding men, like myself, who are, doubtless, amongst its members. In their blindness, passive instruments! they are ignorant of the object to which they are impelled and instrumental; and I pity them, and will pray to God to enlighten them as He has enlightened me."

"Thus, then, my son," said the Père d'Aigrigny, rising, livid and aghast, "you come to ask me to sever the ties which bind you to the company?"

"I do, father; I have taken an oath at your hands, and I pray of you to absolve me of that oath."

"Thus, then, my son, you understand, that all the engagement freely taken in former days by you should be considered as vain and dissolved?"

"Yes, father."

"Thus, then, my son, there will henceforward be nothing in common between you and our society?"

"No, father, as I wish to be released from my vows."

"But you know, my son, that the company may release you, but you cannot release yourself from it?"

"The step I have taken, father, must prove to you the importance I attach to my oath, since I came to you to ask to be released from it. Still, even if you refuse me, I shall no longer consider myself bound either in the eyes of God or man."

"It is perfectly clear," said P. d'Aigrigny to Rodin; and his words expired on his lips, so deep was his despair.

Suddenly, whilst Gabriel, with his eyes fixed on the ground, was awaiting the reply of P. d'Aigrigny, who was mute and motionless, Rodin appeared struck with a sudden idea, when he perceived that the R. P. still held in his hand the note he had written in pencil.

The socius quickly approached P. d'Aigrigny, and said to him in a low tone, and with an air of doubt and alarm,—

"Have you not read my note?"

"I had not thought of it," replied the R. P. mechanically.

Rodin appeared to make a great effort over himself to repress an impulse of violent anger, and then said to P. d'Aigrigny, in a calm tone,—

"Read it, then——"

Scarcely had the R. P. cast his eyes on the billet than a sudden ray of hope lighted up his countenance, till then so utterly despairing, and pressing the hand of the socius, with an expression of deep gratitude he said to him,—

"You are right, Gabriel is ours."

CHAPTER VI.

THE RETURN.

PÈRE D'AIGRIGNY, before he addressed Gabriel, reflected deeply : his countenance, hitherto so dejected, gradually became more serene. He appeared to meditate, calculating on the effects of the eloquence which he was about to employ on a theme so admirable, and of such certain effect, as that which the socius, struck with the danger of their position, had written rapidly with his pencil, and which in his trouble the R. P. had at first neglected.

Rodin resumed his post of observation near the chimney, where he leaned on his elbow, after having thrown on the R. P. d'Aigrigny a look of disdainful and angry superiority, accompanied by a very significant shrugging of the shoulders.

After this involuntary manifestation, fortunately unperceived by the R. P. d'Aigrigny, the corpse-like countenance of the socius resumed its icy calm : his placid eyelids, a moment raised in anger and impatience, fell, and half veiled his small dull eyes.

It must be confessed that Père d'Aigrigny, in spite of his elegant and flowing language, in spite of the attractions of his face and his endowments as an accomplished and refined man of the world,—Père d'Aigrigny was often surpassed and controlled by the pitiless firmness, the devilish cunning and depth of Rodin, that repulsive, dirty, meanly clad old man, who, however, but seldom quitted his humble character of secretary and mute auditor.

The influence of education is so powerful, that Gabriel, in spite of the formal rupture which he had provoked, felt still intimidated by the presence of Père d'Aigrigny, and awaited with deep anguish the reply of the reverend father to his formal and direct request to be released from his former oaths.

His reverence, having, no doubt, skilfully combined his plan of attack, at length broke silence, and heaving a deep sigh, and giving to his countenance, recently so stern and irritated, a touching expression of tenderness, said to Gabriel, with an affectionate tone,—

"Pardon me, my dear son, for having so long kept silence, but your sudden determination took me so utterly by surprise, and created so many painful emotions, that I required some moments to collect myself, and endeavour to penetrate the cause of your desire to sever from us ; and I believe I have detected it. Have you, my dear son, reflected well on the importance of this step ?"

"Yes, father."

"You have absolutely decided on abandoning the company, even in opposition to my wishes ?"

"It will be painful to me, father ; but I am resolved upon it."

"It must, indeed, be painful to you, my dear son ; for you freely took an irrevocable oath ; and that oath, according to our statutes, would enjoin you not to quit the company but with the consent of your superiors."

"Father, I was then ignorant, as you know, of the nature of the engagement I entered into ; but now, better informed, I ask to withdraw ; my only desire is to obtain a curacy in some village far from Paris. I feel an irresistible vocation for such humble and useful functions, for there is in the country so much dreadful misery, ~~so much~~ profound ignorance, as to all which tends to ameliorate the condition of the agricultural labourer, whose existence is as wretched as that of the Negro slave. For, what is his liberty ? what his instruction ? Oh ! it seems to me that, by Divine assistance, I could, as a village curate, render some service to my fellow-creatures ! It would, therefore, be painful to me, father, to have you refuse me what —— ”

“ Oh, make your mind easy, my son,” replied Père d’Aigrigny, “ I do not propose to contend any further against your desire to separate from us.”

“ Then, father, you release me from my vows ? ”

“ I cannot do that of myself, my dear son ; but I will write immediately to Rome to request the authority of our general.”

“ I thank you, father ! ”

“ Soon, therefore, my dear son you will be delivered from those bonds which weigh upon you ; and the men whom you differ from with so much bitterness will not the less continue to pray for you, that God may preserve you from any further wanderings. You believe yourself severed from us, my dear son, but we shall never consider ourselves as severed from you : we do not thus rend asunder the ties that bind us in habits of paternal attachment. We consider ourselves as ever obliged to our fellow-creatures by the very benefits which we have heaped upon them. Thus, you were poor and an orphan ; we extended our arms towards you, as much for the interest which you really deserved, my dear son, as to spare a very heavy expense to that worthy woman your adopted mother.”

“ Father ! ” said Gabriel, with restrained emotion, “ I am not ungrateful.”

“ I am willing to believe so, my dear son : during the long years we gave you, as to our beloved child, the bread of soul and body ; to-day you desire to sever from, to abandon us. Not only do we consent, now that I have penetrated the real cause of your rupture with us, but it is my duty to release you from your vows.”

“ Of what cause do you speak, father ? ”

“ Alas, my dear son, I can understand your fear ! At this moment dangers threaten us—you know that well —— ”

“ Dangers, father ! ” exclaimed Gabriel.

“ It is impossible, my dear son, that you can be ignorant that, since the fall of our legitimate sovereign, our natural supporter, revolutionary impiety becomes more and more menacing and we are overwhelmed with persecutions. Thus, my dear son, I understand and appreciate, as I should do, the motive which, such being our position, induces you to desire to separate from us —— ”

“ Father ! ” exclaimed Gabriel, with equal indignation and anguish, “ you do not think so of me—you cannot think so ! ”

Père d’Aigrigny, without any attention to Gabriel’s protestation, continued the imaginary picture of the dangers of the company, which, far from being in peril, was already beginning to resume its malign influence.

"Oh, if our order were as all-powerful as it was a few years since!" resumed P. d'Aigrigny; "if it were surrounded by the respect and homage which the faithful owe to it, in spite of the many abominable calumnies with which we are pursued, perhaps then, my dear son, we might have hesitated to resign to you those oaths you have made, to have opened your eyes to the light, to have snatched you from the fatal vertigo to which you are a prey: but now, when we are feeble, oppressed, threatened on all sides, it is our duty, it is our charity, not to make you partake, by force, of the perils from which you have the sagacity to withdraw yourself."

Saying these words, Père d'Aigrigny cast a rapid glance at his socius, who replied by an approving sign, accompanied by a gesture of impatience, which seemed to say, Quick! proceed—proceed!

Gabriel was aghast. There was not in the world a more generous, more devoted heart than his, and we may judge of his feelings when he heard this interpretation put upon his resolution.

"Father," he replied, with a voice full of emotion and eyes filled with tears, "your words are cruel—unjust, for you know I am no coward!"

"No," said Rodin, in his harsh and sarcastic tone, addressing himself to P. d'Aigrigny, "your dear son is prudent!"

At these words of Rodin Gabriel started; a slight colour suffused his pale cheeks, his large blue eyes glistened with generous indignation, and then, faithful to the precepts of resignation and Christian humility, he subdued the sensation of anger, bowed his head, and, too much moved to reply, was silent, and wiped the tear that trickled from his eye.

This tear did not escape the socius, who saw in it a favourable symptom, and again exchanged a look of satisfaction with P. d'Aigrigny.

The latter was then on the point of touching on the vital question, and, in spite of himself and his usual self-control, his voice was slightly tremulous, when, in a manner encouraged, impelled by a look from Rodin, who became extremely attentive, he said to Gabriel,—

"Another motive also compels us not to hesitate in releasing you from your oaths, my dear son—it is a question of extreme delicacy. You have, probably, learnt yesterday from your adopted mother that you were, perchance, called to an inheritance, of whose value I am ignorant."

Gabriel raised his head quickly, and said to P. d'Aigrigny,—

"I have already declared to M. Rodin that my adopted mother only spoke to me of scruples of conscience, and I am ignorant, utterly ignorant, of the existence of the inheritance of which you speak to me, father."

The expression of indifference with which the young priest pronounced these last words was remarked by Rodin.

"Well, then," replied D'Aigrigny, "you are, I am willing to believe, ignorant of this, although all appearances prove the contrary; and prove, indeed, that the knowledge of this inheritance is active in making you desire to separate from us."

"I do not understand you, father."

"Still, what I say is simple enough. I say, that your rupture with us has two motives: in the first place, we are threatened, and you think it prudent to leave us —"

"Father!"

"Allow me to conclude, my dear son, and to proceed to the second motive; if I am deceived, you will say so. The facts are these:—At a former period, and in the supposition that your family, of whose fate you are ignorant, might leave you some property, you had, in return for the care which the company had taken of you,—you had made, I say, a gift of any future property that might fall to you, not to us, but to the poor, whose born guardians we are."

"Well, father?" inquired Gabriel, still ignorant whither this preamble tended.

"Well, my dear son, now that you are certain of enjoying some means, you desire, no doubt, in separating from us, to annul the donation conceded by you in former days."

"To speak clearly, you perjure your oath because we are persecuted, and because you wish to take back your gifts," added Rodin, in a harsh voice, as if to expose at once, in as plain and brutal a manner as possible, Gabriel's position to the Company of Jesus.

At this infamous accusation, Gabriel could only raise his hands and eyes to Heaven, and exclaim, with dolorous agony, "Alas! alas!"

Père d'Aigrigny, after having exchanged an understanding glance with Rodin, said to him in a stern voice, in order that he might appear to feel annoyed at his rude interference,—

"I think you go too far: our dear son would have behaved in the base and cowardly way you describe, if he had been informed of his new position as heir; but, as he affirms the contrary, I must believe him in spite of appearances."

"Father," said Gabriel, pale, full of emotion, trembling, and yet subduing his painful indignation, "I thank you for suspending your judgment, at least. No, I am no coward; for God is my witness, that I was ignorant of the dangers which your company runs: no, I am no coward, no, I am not avaricious; for, God is my witness, that it is but this moment that I learn from you, father, that it is possible I may be called on to receive an inheritance, and that ——"

"One word, my dear son: I have recently learned this fact by the merest chance in the world," said Père d'Aigrigny, interrupting Gabriel; "and that, thanks to the family papers which your adopted mother had handed to her confessor, and which were confided to us when you entered our college. A short time before your return from America, whilst classifying the archives of the company, your name fell under the hand of our R. P., the procureur; the entries were examined, and then we discovered that one of your paternal ancestors, to whom this house in which we now are belonged, left a will, which is to be opened at noon this day. Yesterday evening, we still deemed you as belonging to us: our statutes will it that we should not possess any thing of our own: you had complied with these statutes, by a gift in favour of the patrimony of the poor, which we administer. It was then no longer you, but the company, who, in my person, came forward as heir in your place and stead, furnished with your claims, which I have here in due form. But now, my dear son, that you separate from us, it is for you to present yourself: we only come here as holders of funds for the poor, to whom you had formerly piously given up all property you might one day possess ; but now, at this moment, on the contrary, the hope of a fortune changes your feelings : you are free to do so ; resume your gifts."

Gabriel had listened to Père d'Aigrigny with pained emotion, and then exclaimed : " And it is you, father—you, who think me capable of resuming a donation given freely in favour of the company, to acquit myself toward it for the education it had generously given to me? Is it you, indeed, who can believe me so infamous as to reclaim my word, because I am, perhaps, about to possess a small patrimony ? "

" The patrimony, my dear son, may be small—perhaps, considerable."

" Father ! " exclaimed Gabriel, his eyes kindling, with a proud and noble indifference, " were a king's fortune involved in the matter, I should speak and act as I now do. I claim a right to be believed ; and I now utter my irrevocable determination. You tell me the company to which I belong is in danger : I will ascertain the nature of the evils which threaten it ; and if I find them imminent, spite of the fixed resolve which morally separates me from you at the present moment, I will wait till the dangers with which you are menaced have passed away before I quit the society to which I now belong. As for the inheritance you believe me so eager to obtain, I here formally renounce it even as I have previously bound myself to do ; all I ask is, that the wealth I care not for may be distributed among the poor and needy. I neither know, nor desire to know, if the fortune you speak of be large or small ; be it what it may, it belongs not to me, but the company. My word once passed is not to be recalled. I have already stated to you, father, that my only desire is to obtain a humble curacy in some poor village—the poorer the better, because, then and there, I feel persuaded I could be useful. Thus, then, I have candidly stated how lowly are my wishes, and how unambitious the life I seek. Surely I may crave your belief and admission, that an individual caring so little for the vain pomps of this world is wholly incapable of being instigated by avarice or love of riches to recall a gift once bestowed."

At these words, uttered with all the energy of truth, D'Aigrigny had almost as much difficulty to repress his delight as he had endured some time previously to conceal his alarm. Still preserving an outward calmness, he merely said, in reply to Gabriel,—

" I expected nothing less of you, my dear son ; " then making a sign to Rodin, expressive of his desire that he (Rodin) should join in the attack, the socius quickly comprehending the telegraphic glance and gesture, quitted his attitude by the fire-place, and, approaching Gabriel, leaned upon a table, on which were placed an inkstand and materials for writing ; then commencing, mechanically, to beat a tattoo on the table with his bony knuckles and dirty, ill-shapen nails, he said to D'Aigrigny,—

" All this sounds very fine ; but it seems to me that this favourite protégé of your reverence's has, after all, merely made a verbal promise—a species of undertaking which is worth but very little ; for——"

" Sir ! " exclaimed Gabriel.

" Allow me to speak," said Rodin, coldly ; " the law not choosing to recognise the existence of our order, will not take cognisance of any donations made in favour of the company; you may, therefore, recall to-morrow what you have bestowed to-day."

"And my oath, so to bestow it? sir," inquired Gabriel.

Rodin looked at him fixedly, then replied,—

"Your oath? Why, you also took an oath of eternal obedience to the order, which you vowed never to separate yourself from! And yet, to-day, how irksome has that pledge become, and how anxious you are to be released from it!"

For an instant Gabriel found himself embarrassed by the question, but, quickly feeling how false was the comparison instituted by Rodin, he arose, and with a calm dignity seated himself before the desk, and taking a pen and paper proceeded to write as follows:—

"Before God, who sees and hears me—before you, M. d'Aigrigny and M. Rodin, whom I take as witnesses of my solemn vow—I here renew, freely and voluntarily, the entire and absolute donation of all property to which I may be entitled, and which I bestow on the reverend father D'Aigrigny, as the representative of the Company of Jesus; and to him, for the use and benefit of the said company, I, of my own free will, resign all inheritance to which I may be entitled, whether its amount be great or small; and here I bind myself never to revoke or recall the gift, considering it conscientiously as a just recompense for past favours, and its accomplishment not only as the mere acquittal of a debt of gratitude, but as a pious obligation.

"The present bequest being intended to repay past services, and aid in assisting the distressed and wretched, can never be affected by any future circumstances or events; and, because I know I may be legally enabled to annul the promise I here make of my own free will, I declare that, should I ever, under any circumstances whatever, seek to revoke it, I should merit the contempt and abhorrence of every good person.

"In witness thereof, I write this on the 13th of February, 1832, at Paris; at the moment when the will of one of my paternal ancestors is about to be opened.

GABRIEL DE RENNEPONT."

Then rising, the young priest handed to Rodin the act so formally executed without uttering a word. The socius read it with close attention; then, cold and impassive as ever, he merely looked at Gabriel, and observed,—

"'Tis a well-written promise—nothing more."

Gabriel stood motionless with surprise at this determined boldness and assurance on the part of Rodin, who thus ventured to style a deed expressed with so much truth and fervour, and which so unequivocally contained a renewal of his former resignation of all property in favour of the company, a mere written promise of no weight or value.

The socius was the first to break the silence which prevailed by addressing D'Aigrigny in his usual tone of calm assurance.

"One thing is certain; either your favourite son and protégé here intends that the donation he talks of should be absolute, available, and irrevocable, or ——"

"Sir!" cried Gabriel, restraining himself with much difficulty, and indignantly interrupting Rodin; "spare yourself and me so shameful and degrading a suspicion."

"Well, then," observed the still impassive Rodin, "since you are firmly resolved to make this promise binding, what objection can you have to cause it to be legally attested?"

"None, sir," replied Gabriel, bitterly; "since neither my written words nor oath can convince you of my sincerity."

"My dear son," said D'Aigrigny, gently and affectionately, "did it refer merely to a gift you were making in my favour, I should prefer your simple word to any other guarantee you could offer; but the case is not so. I am here, as I before reminded you, merely as the representative of the company, or rather, as the guardian of the poor, who will profit by your generous abandonment: we cannot, therefore, for humanity's sake, take too many precautions to render the deed strictly legal, in order that our poor brethren may enjoy a certainty, instead of merely possessing a vague hope, subject to be destroyed by any change of will or purpose. Besides, the Almighty may call you hence at any moment; and who can answer for it that your heirs may feel scrupulous as to the fulfilment of the engagement entered into by you?"

"You are right, father," said Gabriel, mournfully; "I did not think of the probability of death. You allude to ——"

At this moment Samuel, opening the door of the chamber, said,—

"Gentlemen, the notary is here; shall I shew him in? At ten o'clock precisely you will be admitted into the house."

"We shall be so much the more pleased to see the notary you speak of," said Rodin, "as we have some matters to talk over with him: have the goodness to request he will join us immediately."

"I will go directly and inform him of your request," said Samuel, quitting the room.

"Now, then," said Rodin to Gabriel, "here is a notary; if you are really in earnest, you may legally attest your written document in his presence, and so relieve yourself of all apprehension for the future."

"Sir," said Gabriel, "whatever may happen, I shall ever hold myself as much bound by what I have here written, and which I beg of you, father, to take into your keeping (here Gabriel handed to D'Aigrigny the paper he had drawn up), as I can possibly do by any legal or attested document I may sign."

"Silence, my dear son," said D'Aigrigny; "the notary is here."

As he spoke these words, the person alluded to entered the apartment.

During the conversation which ensued between the four persons present we will conduct the reader to the interior of the so long shut-up house.

CHAPTER VII.

THE RED CHAMBER.

THE principal door of the walled house (as Samuel had said) had been freed from the masonry, the sheet of lead, and the iron bars which had fastened it up, and now its carved oak panels appeared as fresh and uninjured as on the day when they had been enclosed from the influence of air and time.

The workmen, after having concluded their work of removal, had remained on the steps, as curiously inquisitive as the notary's clerk, who had watched over their labours in aiding in the opening of the door; for they saw Samuel come slowly up from the garden, holding in his hand a large bunch of keys.

"Now, my friends," said the old man, when he reached the lower step of the flight, "your work is finished, and this gentleman's employer will pay you; I have nothing to do but to conduct you to the street door."

"But, I say, my worthy man," exclaimed the clerk, "you would not think of such a thing? We have arrived at a most interesting—the most curious moment, and I and these good fellows the masons are all in a stew to see the inside of this mysterious house; and you cannot, surely, have the heart to send us away?—that is impossible."

"I regret very much being obliged to do so, sir, but I am compelled. I must enter first, and quite alone, into the mansion, before I introduce the heirs for the reading of the will."

"But who gave you such ridiculous and barbarous orders?" said the disappointed clerk.

"My father, sir."

"A most respectable individual, no doubt; but, my worthy sir, let us have a look. My excellent guardian! my capital guardian!" said the clerk, "just one peep through the half-opened door."

"Oh, yes, sir, only just a peep!" added the knights of the trowel, with an eager air.

"It is very disagreeable to me to refuse you, gentlemen," replied Samuel; "but I will not open this door until I am quite alone."

The masons, seeing the inflexibility of the old man, descended the steps of the stairs reluctantly; but the clerk made up his mind to dispute the ground, step by step, and exclaimed,—

"I am waiting for my employer, and will not quit the place without him; he may want me, and whether I remain on the steps or any where else, I suppose, is of no consequence to you, my worthy guardian?"

The clerk was cut short in his entreaty by his employer, who, from the bottom of the court, called to him, with an air of business, saying,—

"Monsieur Piston, quick! come here, Monsieur Piston! come to me directly!"

"What the deuce can he want of me?" said the clerk, quite savage.

"He calls me at the very moment when, perhaps, I might have seen something——"

"Monsieur Piston," repeated the voice, as it approached, "don't you hear me?"

Whilst Samuel was shewing the masons out the clerk saw, at the turn of a clump of trees, his employer appear, hastening to him bare-headed, and appearing very intent on something.

The clerk was then forced to descend the steps to reply to the notary's call, and went towards him with a very ill grace.

"But, monsieur," said M. Dumesnil, "I have been calling for you this hour."

"Sir, I did not hear you," said M. Piston.

"Then you must be deaf. Have you any money about you?"

"Yes, sir," said the clerk, much surprised.

"Well, then, go as quickly as you can to the nearest shop where they sell stamped paper, and bring me three or four large sheets to draw up a deed. Run, for it requires despatch."

"I will, sir," said the clerk, casting a look of despairing regret on the door of the shut-up mansion.

"Make haste, Piston, will you?" continued the notary.

"I don't exactly know, sir, where to go for stamped paper."

"Here is the person in charge of the premises—I dare say he can tell you," replied M. Dumesnil.

Samuel, who had then dismissed the masons, was just at this moment approaching the house.

"Will you be good enough," said the notary, addressing him, "to tell this young gentleman where he is likely to obtain law stamps?"

"Close by, sir," replied Samuel; "at the tobacconist's in the Rue Vielle du Temple, No. 17."

"You hear?" said the notary, to his clerk; "you will get what is required at the tobacconist's, who lives at 17, Rue Vielle du Temple. Come, be quick, Piston! for the deed must be drawn up immediately, and duly prepared before the opening of the will—and time presses."

"I'll attend, sir," answered the clerk, sullenly. "I will be as quick as I can." So saying, he followed his employer, who hastily returned to the chamber, where he had left Rodin, D'Aigrigny, and Gabriel.

Meanwhile, Samuel, ascending the terrace-steps, arrived at the door recently freed by the masons from the brick-work, iron, and lead which had enclosed it.

With deep emotion the old man, after having sought among his bunch of keys for the one required, applied it to the lock, and at length succeeded in making the door turn upon its hinges.

As the long-closed portals once again unclosed, a gust of cold, damp air, such as might issue from a vault suddenly opened, blew on the Jew's face. Unheeding this, Samuel passed on, and having carefully closed and double-locked the door from within, advanced into the hall, which was lighted by a sort of faulight over the door; but the panes had long since lost their transparency, and now wore the appearance of ground glass.

This hall, chequered with alternate diamond-shaped pieces of black and white marble, was spacious and lofty, forming the approach to a wide staircase conducting to the upper story of the building ; the walls, composed of smooth, polished stone, exhibited not the slightest appearance of damp ; neither did the balustrade of wrought iron, appertaining to the staircase, display the smallest spot of rust. Level with the first step was a huge block of grey granite, supporting a statue of black marble, representing a Negro holding a stand for a light. The eyeballs of this singular figure were of white marble, and imparted a strange look of wildness to the countenance, calculated, as well as the whole design, to strike the mind with a feeling allied both to awe and terror.

As the heavy step of the Jew resounded through the vast cupola of this vestibule, a melancholy recollection stole over the senses of the grandson of Isaac Samuel, as he remembered that in all probability the last echoes called forth in that deserted abode had been when his progenitor had closed the doors, upwards of a century and a half ago ; for the faithful friend to whom M. de Rennepont had feigned to sell the house had quickly resigned it in favour of the grandfather of Samuel, who had subsequently bequeathed it, as his own property, to the different branches of his posterity.

To these mournful thoughts which floated in the memory of the old Jew, was added the recollection of the vivid light seen that morning issuing from the opening formed in the covering of the belvédér, and, spite of the firmness and resolution of his character, the Jew involuntarily shuddered as, again selecting a key from his bunch, on the label of which was written, Key of the Red Salon, he proceeded to open a pair of folding-doors conducting to the interior apartments.

The window, which alone of all the others in the house had been opened by the workmen, threw a full and strong light into the apartment, whose hangings of dark-purple damask did not appear to have sustained the least damage from the hand of time ; a thick and rich Turkey carpet covered the floor ; large gilt arm-chairs, modelled after the Sèvres style, belonging to the age of Louis XIV., were ranged in exact order along the walls ; opposite the doors of entrance were a second pair, which, like the wainscot and ceiling, were white, ornamented with mouldings and divers ornaments of dark gold.

On each side of the door were two high stands of buhl-work, richly ornamented with designs in brass and iron, supporting splendid vases of sea-green crystal ; the window, heavily draped with fringed damask curtains, surmounted by a valance cut in sharp points, from each of which depended a large silken tassel, was exactly opposite the fireplace, with its deep blue marble bordered with bands of wrought brass : splendid candelabras, and a clock of the same style as the rest of the furniture, were reflected in a large Venetian glass.

A round table covered with crimson velvet stood in the centre of the salon.

Approaching the table, Samuel perceived lying on it a slip of white vellum, bearing these words :—

“ I desire that my will be opened in this apartment, and that every other chamber is kept closed until my last wishes have been duly read.

“ M. DE R.”

“ Yes,” said the Jew, after having contemplated with profound emotion the lines so long since traced, “ this agrees precisely with the directions transmitted to me by my father, for it appears that the other chambers are filled with objects to which M. de Rennepont attached great price, not for their intrinsic value, but for the circumstances with which they were connected, and that the Chamber of Mourning is a strange and mysterious spot. But," added Samuel, drawing from the pocket of his great coat a book covered with black shagreen and furnished with a lock, from which he took the key previously to placing the book on the table, "here is the cash account, and, according to the orders given to my father, I am to place it in this room before the arrival of the heirs."

The utmost silence reigned around as Samuel laid the important volume on the table; but all at once a circumstance, at once simple yet terrifying, roused him from the deep reverie into which he had fallen.

A clock in the adjoining room, in a clear, distinct note of silvery strength, sounded the tenth hour of the day—the very precise time by all the surrounding clocks.

Samuel's natural good sense rejected all idea of perpetual motion, or the possibility of a clock going on unheeded and unattended for 150 years; still he could not help asking himself, with as much alarm as surprise, by what means this clock had been so long kept going, and more especially how it happened to be so perfectly in accordance with all the time-keepers of the minute.

Instigated by a feeling of restless curiosity, the old man was on the point of entering this chamber, but, recalling the express prohibitions of his father, reiterated by those few lines traced by the hand of M. de Rennepont, and which he had just read, made him stop as he reached the door, and listen with almost breathless attention.

Not a sound, however, was to be heard, save the expiring vibration of the hour which had just struck.

After having long reflected on the singularity of the circumstance, Samuel, associating it with the no less extraordinary light he had that morning seen through the openings in the windows of the belvédère, came to a perfect persuasion that the two incidents were intimately connected with each other.

If the old man could not explain the real cause of these singular appearances, he at least accounted to himself for them, by reflecting on the subterranean communications which, according to tradition, existed between the cellars of the mansion and distant places, and mysterious and unknown persons might thus have entered two or three times in a century into the interior of this abode.

Absorbed by these thoughts Samuel drew nigh to the chimney, which, as we have said, was exactly opposite the window.

A bright ray of the sun, piercing through the clouds, shone fully on two large portraits placed one on each side of the mantelpiece, and which the Jew had not before remarked, and which, full-lengths and of the size of nature, represented one a female and the other a male.

By the colouring, at once subdued and powerful, of these paintings, by the bold and effective touch, it was easy to perceive that they were from the easel of a master.

It would have been, besides, very difficult to have found models more capable of inspiring a great artist.

The woman appeared from twenty-five to thirty years of age, and had a splendid head of brown hair, of golden hue, which graced a white, high, and noble forehead. Her headdress, very different from that which Madame de Sévigné had brought into fashion during the reign of Louis XIV., recalled, on the contrary, that remarkable style of the arrangement of the hair which we observe in several of Veronese's portraits, being formed by large bandeaux, whose wavy braids encircling the cheeks were surmounted by a mass plaited like a crown at the back of the head; the eyebrows beautifully arched over eyes of the brightest sapphire hue, whose look, at once haughty and melancholy, had, as it were, an appearance of fatality about them; the nose, very thin, ended in nostrils slightly expanded; a half-smile, that was almost painful, slightly contracted the mouth; the oval of the face was long; the complexion was pure white, tinted towards the cheeks with a slight blush of red; the set position of the neck and the carriage of the head announced a rare mixture of grace and native dignity. A sort of tunic, or robe of black and lustrous stuff, made what is styled à la vierge, reached up high on the shoulders, and, after having defined an elegant and graceful shape, fell down over the feet, which were entirely hidden by the full folds of the garment.

The attitude of the lady was full of nobleness and simplicity. The head stood out, full of light, and white on a ground of dark grey, marbled in the horizon by some purple clouds which rested on the blue peaks of distant and shadowy hills. The arrangement of the picture, as well as the warm and deep tone of the first outlines, which cut without any shading into these deepened shadings, made it evident that this female was placed on a height whence she could command a view of the whole horizon.

The physiognomy of the lady was deeply and distressingly pensive, and there was especially in her look, half-raised towards heaven, an expression of supplicating grief and resignation, which it might have been supposed almost impossible to delineate.

On the left side of the mantelpiece was the other portrait, as powerfully painted.

It depicted a man of from thirty to thirty-five years, of tall stature. A very large brown mantle, with which he was nobly clad, displayed a sort of black pourpoint, buttoned up to the neck, on which fell a square white collar. The head, striking and full of character, was remarkable for its powerful and manly lineaments, which, however, did not conceal a masterly expression of suffering resignation, and especially of excessive goodness. The hair, as well as the beard and eyebrows, were black; but these last, by a singular caprice of nature, instead of being separated and arched round each brow, extended from one temple to the other in one single curve, and seemed to mark this man's forehead with a black mask.

The background of the picture represented a stormy sky, but beyond some rocks was the sea, which seemed to unite its black waves with the horizon.

The sun shining full on these two remarkable figures, which, once having seen, it was impossible to forget, increased their effect most singularly.

Samuel starting from his reverie, and looking by chance on these portraits, was struck with surprise. They seemed as though they were alive.

"What noble and beautiful countenances!" he exclaimed, approaching nearer, that he might examine them more closely. "Whose portraits are they? not those of the Rennepont family; for my father told me they were all in the Salon of Mourning. Alas!" added the old man, "by the deep sorrow imprinted on their features, they too, as it seems to me, might have been placed in the Salon of Mourning."

Then, after a moment's silence, Samuel resumed,—

"Let us now prepare for the solemn meeting, for the clock has struck ten."

So saying, Samuel placed the gilded arm-chairs about the circular table, and then said with a pensive air,—

"The hour is drawing nigh; and of the descendants of the benefactor of my grandfather, there is but this young priest with that angelic countenance. Can he be, then, the sole descendant of the Rennepont family? He is a priest; and will that race then be extinct with him? Now, then, the moment is come when I must open the door for the reading of the will: Bathsheba will lead the notary hither. Some one knocks! 'tis the ——;" and Samuel, after having cast a last look at the door of the apartment in which ten o'clock had struck, hurried towards the door of the vestibule, behind which he heard voices.

The key turned twice in the lock, and he opened the folding-doors.

To his great chagrin he only saw on the steps Gabriel, with Rodin on his left, and the Père d'Aigrigny on his right.

The notary, and Bathsheba who had conducted them, were behind the principal group.

Samuel could not repress a sigh, and said, bowing as he stood on the threshold of the door,—

"Gentlemen, all is ready; you may enter."

CHAPTER VIII.

THE WILL.

WHEN Gabriel, Rodin, and the Père d'Aigrigny, entered the Red Chamber, they all appeared differently affected.

Gabriel, pale and sad, was full of painful impatience. He was anxious to get away from the house as quickly as possible, and felt relieved from a heavy weight when by a deed, formal in all its clauses and arrangements, and duly witnessed before M. Dumesnil the notary to the succession, he had transferred all his rights in favour of Père d'Aigrigny.

Up to this period it had not occurred to the mind of the young priest that, in bestowing on him the cares which he so generously remunerated, and in compelling him to the vocation by a sacrilegious lie, Père d'Aigrigny had in view the securing the full success of an infamous and dark intrigue.

Gabriel, acting as he did, had not in his own mind yielded to any sentiment of exaggerated delicacy. - He had freely made this donation several years before, and would have thought it the height of baseness to retract it. It was already cruel enough to him to have been suspected of this baseness, and no consideration in the world would have made him incur the smallest reproach for cupidity.

The missionary must have been endowed with a rare and admirable nature, for this flower of scrupulous probity had not been withered in the bud by the deleterious and demoralising influence of his education. But, fortunately, as the cold sometimes preserves bodies from corruption, so the frozen atmosphere in which he had passed a portion of his infancy and youth had benumbed, but not vitiated, his nobler qualities, which were rapidly revived by the vivifying contact with air and freedom.

Père d'Aigrigny, much more pale and excited than Gabriel, had tried to explain and excuse his mental disquietude, by attributing it to the chagrin which he felt at the rupture between his dear son and the Company of Jesus.

Rodin, calm and perfectly master of himself, saw with silent anger the extreme emotion of Père d'Aigrigny, which might have excited strange suspicions in a man less confiding than Gabriel. Yet, notwithstanding his apparent sang froid, the socius was, perhaps, even still more intensely impatient than his superior as to the result of this important affair.

Samuel appeared much dejected; no heir but Gabriel presented himself.

Unquestionably the old man felt a lively sympathy for this young man; but the young man was a priest, and with him would expire the name of the Rennepont family, and the vast fortune so laboriously accumulated would not now be spread and employed according to the desire of the testator.

The different actors in this scene stood around the circular table.

At the moment when, at the notary's invitation, they were about to sit down, Samuel said, pointing to the register in the black shagreen case:—

"Sir, I have been ordered to place that register here; it is closed, but I will hand you the key immediately after the reading of the will."

"This circumstance is noted down in a memorandum which accompanied the will, which is here," said M. Dumesnil, "when that was deposited, in 1682, with M. Thomas le Semelier, privy councillor, notary in the Châtelet de Paris, and then living Place Royale, No. 13."

So saying, M. Dumesnil took from a red morocco case, which he had under his arm, a large and thick envelope of parchment, grown yellow by time. There was a note, fastened by a piece of tape, to this envelope.

"Gentlemen, said the notary, "if you will be so kind as to sit down, I will read this note appended, which directs the forms to be observed at the opening of the will."

The notary, Rodin, Père d'Aigrigny, and Gabriel, seated themselves. The young priest, having his back to the mantelpiece, could not see the portraits.

Samuel, in spite of the notary's invitation, remained standing behind his (the notary's) chair, who read as follows:—

"13th February, 1832, my will is to be taken to the Rue Saint-François, No. 3.

"At ten o'clock precisely, the door of the Red Room on the ground-floor shall be opened to my heirs, who, no doubt, will have reached Paris long before, in the expectation of this day, and will have had the necessary time to have established the proofs of their affinity.

"As soon as they are all assembled my will shall be read, and when the last sound of the midday shall have struck, the succession shall be closed and ended to the profit of those who, according to my request—perpetuated, I trust, by being handed down for a century and a half in my family from this day forward—will have presented themselves in person and not by proxies, on the 13th February, before noon, in the Rue Saint-François."

After after having read these lines in an audible voice the notary paused for a moment, and then added, in a solemn voice,—

"Monsieur Gabriel-François-Marie de Rennepont, priest, having established by notarial acts his paternal affinity and his relationship, a cousin by descent of the testator, and being at this hour the sole descendant of the Rennepont family who has presented himself here, I open the will in his presence, as has been directed."

So saying, the notary drew forth from its envelope the will, which had been previously opened by the President of the Tribunal, with all the formalities required by the law.

The Père d'Aigrigny bent forward, and, leaning on the table, could not repress a deep sigh. Gabriel was prepared to listen with more curiosity than interest.

Rodin was seated a little space away from the table, holding his old hat between his knees, at the bottom of which, half-concealed in the folds of a dirty blue-checked cotton handkerchief, he had placed his watch.

All the attention of the socius was thus divided between the slightest noise he heard without and the slow progress of the hands of his watch, whilst his small and angry eyes seemed to desire to hasten the speed, so great was his impatience to arrive at the hour of noon.

The notary, opening the sheet of vellum, read what follows with profound attention:—

"Hamlet of Villeteuse, 13th February, 1682.

"I am about to escape, by death, from the shame of the galleys, where the implacable enemies of my family have condemned me as a relapsed heretic.

"And, besides, my life is too deeply embittered since my son has died the victim of a mysterious crime.

"Dead at nineteen years of age! Poor Henry! his murderers are unknown! No, not unknown, if I may believe my presentiments.

"To preserve my property for my child I had feigned to abjure Protestantism. So long as this beloved being existed I have scrupulously observed all the Catholic appearances. This deed was most hateful to me, but I did it in my child's interest.

"When they killed him the constraint was insupportable to me : I was watched, and have been accused and condemned as a relapsed heretic ; my property has been confiscated, and I myself condemned to the galleys.

"Oh, what a terrible time I have endured !

"Misery and servitude ! fierce despotism and religious intolerance ! Ah, how sweet it is to quit life—to see no further ills and griefs ! what repose it will be !

"And in a few hours I shall taste that repose.

"I am about to die, and let me, therefore, think of those belonging to me, who live, or rather will live, perhaps, in better times.

"A sum of 50,000 crowns, deposited with a confidential friend, alone remains to me of all my wealth.

"I have no other sons, but many relations, exiled over Europe.

"This sum of 50,000 crowns, divided among all my kinsfolk, would have been but a scanty amount for each. I have otherwise disposed of it.

"And I have done so in conformity with the wise counsel of a man whom I hold in the very highest estimation, for his understanding, his wisdom, and his goodness, are almost superhuman.

"Twice in my life I have seen this man, and under most disastrous circumstances ; twice have I owed my safety to him : once the safety of my soul, once the safety of my body.

"Alas ! perhaps he might have saved my poor child ; but he arrived too late—too late !

"Before he left me he tried to dissuade me from death, for he knew all ; but his voice was powerless : I experienced too much anguish—too many regrets—too great depression.

"Is he, then, destined to live ?—is he ?

"Yes, I have no doubt but that he is destined to live, in order that he may be useful and full of succour to humanity ; and yet life oppresses him, for one day I heard him say, in accents of despairing weariness, that I never can forget, 'Oh, life ! life ! who will free me from thee ?'

"Is it, then, a burden to him ?

"He has left me, and his parting words have made me contemplate death with calmness.

"Thanks to him, my death will not be unprofitable.

"Thanks to him, these lines, written at this moment by a man who in a few hours will have ceased to live, may bring forth, perchance, great things in a century and a half. Ah, yes ! great and noble things, if my wishes are piously attended to by my descendants, for it is to my future race that I thus address myself.

"That they may better understand and appreciate the last wish I make, and which I entrust them to fulfil, they who are as yet non-existent and in the nothingness into which I am about to enter, they must know the persecutions of my family before they can avenge their ancestors : but by a noble revenge !

"My grandfather was a Catholic : tempted less by religious zeal than by perfidious counsel, he affiliated himself, although a layman, to a society whose power has always been terrible and mysterious—to the Society of Jesus."

At these words in the will, the P. d'Aigrigny, Rodin, and Gabriel, looked at each other almost involuntarily. The notary, who did not observe this, still continued,—

"At the end of several years, during which he had not ceased to profess for this society the most entire devotion, he was suddenly enlightened by fearful revelations as to the secret end which it proposed, as well as to its modes of attaining it.

"This was in 1610, a month before the assassination of Henry IV.

"My grandfather, alarmed at the secret, of which he found himself the depositary in spite of himself, and the signification of which was made most complete afterwards by the death of the best of kings—my grandfather not only broke with the Society of Jesus, but, as his Catholicism altogether appeared to him wholly responsible for the crimes of the society, he abandoned the Romish religion, in which he had hitherto lived, and became a Protestant.

"Irrefragable proofs, attesting the complicity of two members of this company with Ravaillac—a complicity also borne out by the crime subsequently committed by Jean Châtel the regicide, were in my grandfather's hands.

"Such was the first cause of the deadly enmity of this society against our family.

"Thanks to God, these papers are in a place of safety! My father handed them to me, and, if my last wishes are executed, these papers, marked A. M. C. D. G., will be found in the ebony coffer in the Room of Mourning in the Rue Saint-François.

"My father was thus exposed to bitter persecution: his ruin, his death, perhaps, would have been the consequence of them, but for the interposition of an angel in a woman's form, for whom he preserved an almost religious worship.

"The portrait of this female, whom I also saw some years since, as well as that of the man to whom I have vowed the deepest veneration, have been painted by me from memory, and are placed in the Red Chamber of the Rue Saint-François. Both will be, I hope, the objects of a grateful respect to the descendants of my family."

For some moments Gabriel had become more and more attentive to the reading of the will: he thought that by a singular coincidence one of his ancestors had, two centuries before, severed himself from the Society of Jesus, as he himself had dissevered from it within an hour, and that this rupture, dating two centuries back, also gave date to the hatred with which the Company of Jesus had always persecuted his family.

The young priest found it no less strange that this inheritance, transmitted to him after the lapse of 150 years by one of his ancestors, a victim of the Society of Jesus, should return, by the voluntary surrender which he (Gabriel) had just made, to the same society.

When the notary read the passage relative to the two portraits, Gabriel, who, as well as Père d'Aigrigny, was sitting with his back to these paintings, turned to look at them.

Scarcely had the missionary cast his eyes on the portrait of the female than he uttered a loud cry of surprise and almost affright.

The notary stopped reading the will, and looked at the young priest with uneasiness,

CHAPTER IX.

THE LAST STROKE OF NOON.

AT the cry uttered by Gabriel the notary had suspended the reading of the will, and Père d'Aigrigny had drawn close to the young priest.

Gabriel, standing up and trembling violently, contemplated the portrait of the female with increasing amazement.

Then he said in a low tone, and as if speaking to himself,—

“Is it possible that chance should produce such resemblances? Those eyes, at once so proud and sorrowful, are hers; and that forehead, that paleness, and those features—yes, those features!”

“My dear son, what ails you?” said Père d'Aigrigny, as much astonished as Samuel and the notary.

“It is just eight months since,” said the missionary, with a voice profoundly agitated and, fixing his eyes on the picture, “I was in the power of the Indians in the midst of the Rocky Mountains. They had placed me on a cross, and were beginning to scalp me. I was about to die when Divine Providence sent me unexpected succour. Yes, it was that female who saved me!”

“That female!” exclaimed at once Samuel, D'Aigrigny, and the notary. Rodin alone appeared completely unmoved by this episode of the portrait, his countenance was contracted with fierce anger, and he bit his nails to the quick, as he contemplated with anguish the slow march of the hands of his watch.

“What do you mean? What female saved your life?” inquired Père d'Aigrigny.

“Yes, this female,” replied Gabriel, in a lower and almost frightened tone, “this female, or rather a female who resembles her so completely, that, if this picture had not been painted a century and a half ago, I should believe that it had been painted for her; for I cannot account for so striking a likeness being the effect of chance. But,” he added, after a moment's silence, and heaving a deep sigh, “the mysteries of nature and the will of God are impenetrable.”

And Gabriel fell back in his chair quite overcome in the midst of a profound silence, which Père d'Aigrigny soon broke by saying,—

“It is, in truth, a wonderful resemblance, and nothing more, my dear son; but the very natural gratitude which you felt for your benefactress adds to this singular caprice of nature a great interest for you.”

Rodin, devoured by impatience, said to the notary, by whose side he was sitting,—

“It seems to me, sir, that all this little romance has nothing to do with the will.”

“You are right, sir,” replied the notary, again seating himself; “but the fact is so extraordinary, so romantic, as you say, that we cannot forbear from partaking of the gentleman's extreme astonishment.”

And he pointed to Gabriel, who, leaning his elbow on one of the arms of the chair, hid his face in his hands, and seemed completely absorbed.

The notary then continued the reading of the will:—

“Such have been the persecutions to which my family have been exposed from the Society of Jesus.

“This Society possesses at this time my property by confiscation. I am about to die, may its hatred be quenched in my death, and so spare my descendants !

“My descendants, whose fate is my sole, my last thought, at this solemn moment.

“This morning I have summoned to me a man of probity long-tried—Isaac Samuel. He owes his life to me, and every day I rejoice that I was able to preserve to the world so honest, so excellent a creature.

“Before the confiscation of my property Isaac Samuel had always taken charge of it, with as much intelligence as honesty. I have confided to him the fifty thousand crowns which a faithful depositary had restored to me.

“Isaac Samuel, and after him his descendants, to whom he will bequeath this debt of gratitude, will undertake to invest and accumulate this sum until the expiration of the one hundred and fiftieth year from this day.

“This sum thus accumulated must become enormous, and form a king’s fortune, if events are not adverse to its accumulation.

“May my wishes be heard by my descendants as to the division and employment of this immense sum !

“There arrive, unhappily, in a century and a half, such a change of events, such variations, so many vicissitudes of fortune, amongst the successive generations of a family, that probably in one hundred and fifty years my descendants will be found to belong to different classes of society, and will represent the different social elements of their time.

“Perhaps there will be found amongst them men endowed with great intelligence, or great courage, or great virtue ; perhaps learned men, names illustrious in war or the fine arts ; perhaps, also, obscure artizans, humble tradesmen ; perhaps, also, great criminals.

“Whatever may happen, my most ardent, most anxious desire is, that my descendants will draw nigh to each other, and re-form my family by a close and sincere union, by putting in practice amongst themselves those divine words of Christ, ‘LOVE ONE ANOTHER.’

“This union would have a most salutary example ; for it appears to me, that from union, from the association of men with one another, ought to proceed the future happiness of humanity.

“The company which has for so long a time persecuted my family is one of the most tremendous examples of the immense power of association, even when applied to evil.

“There is something so fertile, so divine, in this principle, that it sometimes impels to good the worst and most dangerous associations.

“Thus, missions have thrown rare, but pure and noble lights, into this dark Society of Jesus, which was, notwithstanding, founded for the detestable and impious purpose of destroying by a homicidal system of education, all will, all thought, all liberty, all intelligence amongst the people, in order to deliver them over trembling, superstitious, brutalised, and defenceless, to the despotism of kings, whom the company would reserve to itself, in order to govern them in their turn by their confessors."

At this passage in the will there was a new and strange look exchanged between Gabriel and the Père d'Aigrigny.

The notary resumed :—

"If an association perverted as this is, based on human degradation, fear, and despotism, and pursued by the curse of the people, has engrafted itself for ages, and frequently governed the world by stratagem and terror, what might not an association effect which, emanating from fraternity and evangelic love, proposed to enfranchise man and woman kind from all degrading servitude, and to lead to happiness here below those who have known in life only the grief and miseries of increasing and enriching the soil which had fed them—to lighten those whom ignorance has depraved—to favour the free expansion of all the passions which God in His infinite wisdom, in His inexhaustible bounty, has implanted in man, as so many powerful levers—to sanctify all that emanates from God, love as well as maternity, power as well as wisdom, beauty as well as genius?—to render men, indeed, really religious, and profoundly grateful towards their Creator, by giving them the knowledge of the splendours of nature, and their just share of the treasures with which He has gifted us ?

"Oh, may Heaven will that, in a century and a half, the descendants of my family, faithful to the last wishes of a heart friendly to humankind, may thus unite in a holy community !

"If Heaven wills that amongst them are charitable souls, full of commiseration for those who suffer—elevated understandings, fond of freedom—eloquent and warm hearts, firm characters—females uniting beauty, mind, and goodness—how productive and great must be the powerful union of all these ideas, all these influences, all these forces, all these attractions, assembled around this princely fortune, which, concentrated by this association, and wisely regulated, may render practicable the most Utopian schemes !

"What a marvellous source of fruitful thoughts and generous impulses, what salutary and vivifying rays, will incessantly dart from this centre of charity, emancipation, and love !

"What great things may be attempted, what magnificent examples given to the world by practice ! What a divine apostleship ! In truth, what an irresistible impulse towards good may be impressed on the whole of human nature by a family thus grouped, and thus dispensing its means of action !

"And then, that association for good may be capable of combating the fearful association of which I am the victim, and which, perhaps, in a century and a half, will have lost nothing of its redoubtable influences !

"Then, to this work of darkness, restraint, and despotism, which weighs so heavily on the Christian world, my race may oppose a work of light, expansion, and liberty.

"The genius of good and the genius of evil will be in operation face to face.

"The struggle would commence, and God would protect the just.

“ And in order that the immense pecuniary resources which must give so much power to my family should not be exhausted, but renew with years, my heirs attending to my wishes will invest, under the same conditions of accumulation, double the sum which I have bequeathed ; and then, in another century and a half after them, what a new source of power and action for their descendants ! What a perpetuity of effecting good !!

“ They will find, I should observe, in the large ebony chest in the Room of Mourning, certain ideas drawn up on the subject of this association.

“ These are my last wishes, or, rather, my latest hopes.

“ If I require absolutely that my race should be in person in the Rue Saint-François on the day of the opening of this will, it is in order that, being united at this solemn moment, they will see and know each other ; and then, perhaps, my words will strike them, and, instead of living divided, they will unite : their interests will gain by it, and my wish be accomplished.

* * * * *

“ Sending as I did, a few days since, to those of my family whom exile has dispersed over Europe, a medal, on which is engraven the date of this meeting of my heirs, in a century and a half from this day, I have felt it right to keep secret the real motive, only saying that my lineage had a great interest in being present at this meeting.

“ I have acted thus because I know the cunning and pertinacity of the company whose victim I am ; for if the society could know that at this period my descendants will divide immense sums, their deep-laid schemes, and, perchance, great dangers, would beset and menace my family, for sinister orders are transmitted from century to century in the Society of Jesus.

“ May this precaution be efficacious !

“ May my wish expressed on the medals have been faithfully transmitted from generation to generation !

“ If I fix the day and fatal hour at which my succession will be irrevocably closed in favour of those of my descendants who shall present themselves in the Rue Saint-François on the 13th February, 1832, before noon, it is because there must be a limit assigned to all delay, and that my heirs will have been sufficiently informed for many years that they must not fail to be present at this meeting.

“ After the reading of my will, the person who shall be the depositary of the accumulation of funds shall declare their value and their amount, in order that at the last stroke of noon the sums thus accumulated shall be revealed and divided amongst the heirs assembled.

“ Then the apartments of the house shall be opened. They will see therein things worthy of their interest, their pity, and their respect, especially in the Chamber of Mourning.

“ My desire is that this house is not sold, but remains furnished as it is, and that it may serve as a place of assembling for my descendants, if, as I hope, they attend to my last prayer.

“ If, on the contrary, there is division amongst them—if, instead of uniting to carry out one of the most generous enterprises that ever marked an age, they yield to egotistical passions—if they prefer a sterile individuality to a productive association—if in this immense fortune they only see the means of a frivolous dissipation or sordid accumulation, may they be accursed by all those they might have loved, succoured, and emancipated ; let this house be destroyed and rased to the ground, and let all these papers, of which Isaac Samuel will have left the inventory, be, as well as the two portraits in the Red Chamber, burned by the guardian of the abode.

" I have said.

" Now my duty ends.

" In all this I have followed the advice of the man I venerate and love as the real image of God on earth.

" The faithful friend who handed to me the 50,000 crowns, the wreck of my fortune, alone knows how I mean to employ them. I could not refuse to his friendship, firm as I have proved it to be, this proof of confidence ; but, at the same time, I have concealed from him the name of Isaac Samuel, for this would have been to expose him, and his descendants especially, to great dangers.

" In a short time my friend, who is ignorant of my intention to die, will be here with my notary, and it is to their hands that, after due and customary formalities, I shall consign this sealed testament.

" Such are my last wishes. I submit their accomplishment to the superintendence of Providence. God will surely protect those wishes of love, peace, union, and liberty.

*" This mystic* will having been freely made by me, and entirely written by my own hand, I trust and desire that it is scrupulously executed in spirit and in letter.*

" Dated this 13th February, 1682, one o'clock P.M.

" MARIUS DE RENNEPONT."

As the notary had continued the reading of the will, Gabriel had been successively agitated by various and painful impressions. At first, as we have said, he thought it strange that fate had decreed that this immense fortune, coming from a victim of the company, should revert to this company by a donation which he had just renewed.

Then his charitable and elevated mind having made him understand that he might have been the instrument of the noble family association so earnestly hoped for by Marius de Rennepont, he thought, with deep bitterness, that in consequence of his renunciation, and in the absence of all other heirs, this vast idea was impossible of execution, and that this fortune, much more considerable than he had conjectured, would fall into the hands of an evil society, who might make it a terrible means of action.

But it must be said, the soul of Gabriel was so beautiful, so pure, that he did not entertain the slightest personal regret in hearing that the wealth which he had renounced was so vast ; he was rather pleased, by a touching contrast, to discover that he had escaped being rich, by reflecting on the humble parsonage where he hoped soon to live, in the practice of the most holy evangelical virtues.

These ideas clashed in his mind confusedly. The sight of the female portrait, the sinister disclosures revealed in the will, the expansive views contained in the last wishes of M. de Rennepont, so many extraordinary incidents, threw Gabriel into a sort of stupor of astonishment, in which he was still plunged when Samuel said to the notary, handing to him the key of the register,—

* This is the phrase used in French jurisprudence.

“You will find, sir, in this register the actual amount of the sums which are in my possession, in consequence of the capitalisation and accumulation of the 150,000 francs confided to my grandfather by M. Marius de Rennepont.”

“Your grandfather!” exclaimed Père d'Aigrigny, greatly surprised. “Is it your family, then, which has constantly invested these sums?”

“Yes, sir; and my wife will in a few moments bring the chest which contains the securities.”

“And what may be the amount of the figure?” inquired Rodin, with a well-counterfeited air of indifference.

“M. le Notaire can easily calculate,” replied Samuel, with the most perfect simplicity, as though merely referring to the 150,000 francs forming the original deposit. I have now sterling value to deliver up, amounting to 212,175,000 francs. No, let me be exact; 160,000, I think, without reckoning ——”

“What did you say?” exclaimed D'Aigrigny, without allowing Samuel to proceed, and caring very little for the odd money when so splendid a total was named.

“Yes, yes,” cried Rodin, almost gasping for breath, and for the first time in his life losing his cool self-possession, “let's have the figure—the amount—the total.”

“I observed, sir,” said the old man, “that I had now in hand 212,175,000 francs, part in cash, part in securities; as you will find, M. le Notaire, for here comes my wife with the money itself.”

As he spoke, Bathsheba entered, bearing the cedar casket containing the immense sums just recited. This she placed on the table, and, after exchanging a look of affectionate regret with Samuel, quitted the room.

An almost stupor seemed to seize upon the different persons present, as Samuel pronounced the immense sums which had been left in his charge.

D'Aigrigny and Rodin reckoned upon about 40,000,000; but even this enormous wealth was now declared to be five times greater.

Gabriel, as he heard the notary while reading the will speak of a fortune befitting a king, and entirely ignorant of the prodigious effects of employing a capital well, had valued the bequest at three or four millions. Well then might the amount startle and overwhelm his ideas, which, spite of his pure and honourable mind, were almost thunderstruck by the conviction thus pressed upon him, that, had he been less precipitate, these boundless treasures would have all been his.

The notary, almost as much surprised as the rest, began examining the accounts laid before him, as though he could scarcely credit the evidence of his own senses.

The Jew remained pensive and sad, painfully regretting there being no other candidate for this immense inheritance.

In the midst of the deep silence which prevailed, the clock in the adjoining chamber began slowly to strike the hour of twelve. Samuel started, then heaved a profound sigh: a few seconds only remained ere the fatal hour would have sounded, and further hope of other heirs arriving be lost for ever.

The agitation of D'Aigrigny, Rodin, and Gabriel was so great, and their minds so pre-occupied, that it never once occurred to them how singular it was a clock should be going in a house so long deserted.

"Twelve o'clock!" exclaimed Rodin; and by an involuntary movement he hastily grasped the casket with both his hands, as though to take possession of it.

"At length!" cried D'Aigrigny, with an expression of joy, triumph, and enthusiasm, impossible to describe; and then he added, throwing himself into Gabriel's arms, and embracing him with extreme energy and excitement,—“Oh, my dear son, how the poor will bless you! You are a Saint Vincent-de-Paul! You shall be canonised—I swear you shall!”

"Let us first thank Providence," said Rodin, with a grave and excited air, and falling on his knees; "let us thank Providence, who has permitted so much wealth to be employed to the greater glory of the Lord."

Père d'Aigrigny, after having embraced Gabriel, took him by the hand and said,—

"Rodin is right. Fall on your knees, my dear son, and let us return thanks to Providence."

So saying, Père d'Aigrigny knelt down, drawing with him Gabriel, who, giddy, confused, and no longer able to collect his thoughts, so much had the various events bewildered him, knelt mechanically.

The last stroke of noon struck. They all rose.

Then the notary said, in a voice slightly altered, for there was something extraordinary and solemn in the scene,—

"No other heir of M. Marius de Rennepont having presented himself before noon, I execute the will of the testator, in declaring in the name of justice and law, Monsieur François-Marie-Gabriel de Rennepont, here present, the sole and only heir and possessor of the property, personal and real, land, and valuables of all sorts, arising from the succession of the testator: which property, the heir, Gabriel de Rennepont, priest, has freely and voluntarily made gift, by notarial act, to Sieur Frédéric Emmanuel de Bordeville, marquis d'Aigrigny, priest, who by the same deed has accepted the same, and has thus become legitimate successor in the stead and place of the said Gabriel de Rennepont, by the fact of this donation between two surviving persons, engrossed by me this morning, and signed Gabriel de Rennepont, and Frédéric d'Aigrigny, priests."

At this moment there was heard in the garden a loud noise of voices. Bathsheba entered hastily, and said to her husband, in an agitated voice,—

"Samuel, a soldier, who insists ———"

Bathsheba could not say another word.

At the door of the Red Chamber appeared Dagobert.

The soldier was deadly pale, and seemed ready to sink; he carried his left arm in a sling, and was leaning on Agricola.

At the sight of Dagobert the flaccid and cadaverous eyelids of Rodin were suddenly injected, as if all his blood had then mounted to his brain.

Then the socius seized the casket with a movement of anger, and with a grasp so ferocious, that it seemed as if he were resolved, by covering it with his body, to defend it at the peril of his life.

CHAPTER X.

DONATION BY THE LIVING.

PÈRE D'AIGRIGNY did not recognise Dagobert, and had never seen Agricola; and thus for a moment did not comprehend the excessive fright which Rodin exhibited; but the R. P. soon understood all when he heard Gabriel utter a cry of joy, and saw him throw himself into the arms of the smith, saying,—

"Thou, brother! and you, my second father!—Ah, it is Heaven itself that sends you!"

After having clasped Gabriel's hand, Dagobert advanced towards the Père d'Aigrigny with a quick, though somewhat unsteady step.

Observing the threatening looks of the soldier, the R. P., strong in his acquired rights, and feeling himself at home as twelve o'clock had struck, receded a step and said, with an imperious air, to the veteran,—

"Who are you, sir; and what do you want?"

Instead of making any reply, the soldier advanced several paces nearer, and then stopping short when he was close to Père d'Aigrigny, he looked at him for a moment with so fearful a mixture of curiosity, contempt, hatred, and boldness, that the ex-colonel of hussars, for a time disconcerted, cast down his eyes before the pale face and enraged look of the veteran.

The notary and Samuel, struck by surprise, remained mute spectators of this scene, whilst Agricola and Gabriel followed with anxiety the least movement of Dagobert.

As to Rodin, he had feigned to lean over the casket, in order to be able to cover it effectually with his body.

At last overcoming the embarrassment he experienced from the unrelenting gaze of the soldier, Père d'Aigrigny raised his head and repeated:

"I ask you, sir, who you are; and what you seek?"

"Then you do not remember me?" said Dagobert, restraining himself with great difficulty.

"No, sir."

"Well, then," replied the soldier, with the utmost disdain, "you lowered your eyes with shame when, at Leipsic, where you fought with the Russians against the French, General Simon, covered with wounds, replied to you, renegade! when you demanded his sword, 'I do not surrender my sword to a traitor!' and dragging himself along the ground until he reached a Russian grenadier, he surrendered his sword to him. By the side of General Simon there was a soldier also wounded. I was that soldier!"

THE WILL DISPUTED

"Well, sir; and what is your business here?" inquired Père d'Aigrigny, with difficulty mastering his anger.

"I wish to unmask you,—you, who are a priest as infamous, and as execrated by all, as Gabriel here is a priest, admired and blessed by all!"

"Sir!" said the marquis, becoming livid with anger and emotion.

"I tell you that you are a scoundrel," said the soldier, energetically, "to have used the infamous means you have to despoil the daughters of Marshal Simon, Gabriel, and Mademoiselle de Cardoville, of their inheritance!"

"What do you say?" asked Gabriel; "the daughters of Marshal Simon——"

"Are your relatives, my dear boy; as well as that worthy young lady, Mademoiselle de Cardoville, the benefactress of Agricola, also. 'This priest,' and he pointed to Père d'Aigrigny, 'has shut up one as mad in a lunatic asylum, and immured the orphans in a convent. As to you, my dear lad, I did not hope to meet you here, believing that they would have kept you away as well as the others, this morning: but, thank God, you are here; and I have come in time. I could not arrive earlier because of my wound. I have lost so much blood that I have been in a swoon all the morning."

"Oh!" exclaimed Gabriel, with anxiety, "I had not remarked that you carried your arm in a sling. How did you come by your wound?"

At a look from Agricola, Dagobert replied,—

"It is nothing,—I had a fall; but here I am; and now, we will unmask all these treacheries."

It is impossible to depict the curiosity, anguish, surprise, and fear, of the different actors of this scene, whilst listening to these threatening words of Dagobert.

But of all, the one most overwhelmed was Gabriel. His angelic features were agonised, his knees trembled. Thunderstruck by the disclosure of Dagobert, and learning the existence of other heirs, for some moments he could not utter a syllable; but at length he exclaimed, in a despairing voice,—

"It is I, alas! it is I, who am the cause of the spoliation of this family!"

"You, my brother!" said Agricola.

"Have they not also sought to rob you?" added Dagobert.

"The will," replied Gabriel, with increasing anguish, "bequeathed the property to those heirs who should present themselves before mid-day."

"Well!" said Dagobert, alarmed at the emotion of the young priest.

"Noon has struck," replied Gabriel, "and I was the only member of my family here present. Do you understand me now? The moment has passed, and the heirs are dispossessed by me."

"By thee!" said Dagobert, stammering with joy,—"by thee, my dear child! Then all is still saved!"

"Yes—but——"

"All is saved!" added Dagobert, radiant with joy, and interrupting Gabriel; "you will share it with the others—I know you will—enough!"

"But I have surrendered all this property in an irrevocable manner," cried Gabriel, with despair.

"Surrendered all the property!" said Dagobert, petrified; "but to whom—to whom?"

"To that gentleman," said Gabriel, pointing to D'Aigrigny.

"To him!—to him!" repeated Dagobert, aghast,—“to the renegade who has always been the evil demon of the family!"

"But, brother," exclaimed Agricola, "did you then know of your claims to this inheritance?"

"No," replied the young priest, overwhelmed,—“no; I only knew it this morning from Père d'Aigrigny, who had been, as he assured me, recently instructed in my rights by family papers, found upon me long ago, and handed by our mother to her confessor."

The smith appeared struck with a sudden idea, and exclaimed,—

"Now I see it all! They saw by these papers that you would be rich some day, and so they took an interest in you, admitted you into the college, where we could never see you, and afterwards they induced you by falsehood to take holy orders; so that, by making you a priest, they ultimately induced you to make this donation. Ah, sir!" added Agricola, turning towards Père d'Aigrigny indignantly, "my father is right, and this is the infamous plot!"

During this scene, the R. P. and his socius, at first alarmed and shaken in their audacity, had gradually resumed their perfect sang froid.

Rodin, still leaning on the casket, had said several words in a low voice to Père d'Aigrigny, and when Agricola, unable to repress his indignation, had reproached this latter with his infamous machinations, he lowered his eyes, and meekly replied,—

"It is our duty to forgive injuries, and offer them to the Lord as a proof of our humility."

Dagobert overcome, stunned by all he had learnt, felt almost as if his senses were leaving him; after so much anguish and so many difficulties, his strength failed him at this new and terrible blow.

The true and sensible remarks of Agricola, taken in connexion with certain parts of the will, suddenly enlightened Gabriel as to the end which Père d'Aigrigny had in view by taking charge of his education, and then inducing him to join the Company of Jesus. For the first time in his life, Gabriel saw at a glance all the bearings of the dark intrigue of which he was the victim, and then indignation and despair surmounting his habitual timidity, the missionary, with sparkling eyes and cheeks inflamed with noble ire, exclaimed, addressing himself to Père d'Aigrigny,—

"Thus then, father, when you placed me in one of your colleges, it was not from interest or commiseration, but only with a hope of inducing me one day to renounce my share of this inheritance in favour of your order; and it was not enough to sacrifice me alone to your cupidity, but it was requisite, besides, to render me the involuntary instrument of an infamous spoliation! If I alone were concerned—if it were but a question of my claims to this wealth which you covet, I would not ask it again. I am a minister of a religion which has glorified and sanctified poverty. The donation to which I have assented you have obtained, and I do not desire—I never shall desire any thing. But it has become a question of the property which belongs to poor orphan girls, brought from distant exile by my adopted father, and I will not allow them to be dispossessed ;—it has become a question of the benefactress of my adopted brother, and I will not have her dispossessed ;—it has become a question of the last wishes of a dying man, who, in his ardent love of humanity, has bequeathed to his descendants an evangelic mission—an admirable labour of progress, love, union, and liberty, and I will not consent that this mission, this labour, be stifled in its birth. No !—no ! and I tell you that this mission shall be accomplished, even if I should revoke the donation which I have made.”

At these words Père d'Aigrigny and Rodin looked at each other, and shrugged their shoulders slightly.

At a sign from the socius the R. P. began to speak with unshaken calmness and in a low and unctuous tone of voice, and keeping his eyes constantly cast down.

“With reference to this inheritance of M. de Rennepont, there are several circumstances, apparently complicated, which present themselves—several shadowy assertions which seem menacing, whilst, in fact, nothing can be more simple, more natural, than this whole affair. Let us proceed in order—let us cast aside all calumnious imputations for the present,—we can revert to them hereafter. M. l'Abbé Gabriel de Rennepont—and I humbly beg him to contradict and rectify my words if I diverge, in the slightest manner, from the strictest truth,—M. l'Abbé Gabriel, to evince his gratitude for the care which, in former days, he has received from the company to which I consider it an honour to belong, made to me, as the representative of this company, freely and voluntarily, a gift of the property which might at any time revert to him, and of the amount of which, as well as I myself, he was entirely ignorant.”

The Père d'Aigrigny looked at Gabriel as if to obtain his acquiescence to these words.

“That is true,” said the young priest ; “I made the gift freely.”

“This morning, in a conversation of a most confidential nature, and on which I shall be silent, assured as I am of the approbation of M. l'Abbé Gabriel ?”

“Certainly,” said Gabriel, generously, “the subject of that conversation is unimportant.”

“It was then in consequence of this conversation that M. l'Abbé Gabriel again manifested the desire to abide by this donation, I will not say in my favour, for terrestrial possessions touch me but little, but in favour of holy and benevolent works, of which our company would become the dispensing power. I appeal to the frankness of M. l'Abbé Gabriel, begging him to declare if he is or is not bound, not only by a most solemn oath but also by a deed perfectly legal, and drawn up and witnessed by M. Dumesnil, which I have here?”

“It is true,” replied Gabriel.

“The deed was drawn up by me,” added the notary.

“But Gabriel only gave you what belonged to him,” exclaimed

Dagobert; "this dear lad could not suppose that you would make use of him to plunder the others."

"Do me the favour, sir, to allow me to explain," replied the Père d'Aigrigny, courteously; "and then you shall have every attention."

Dagobert, with an effort, repressed a movement of painful impatience.

The R. P. continued,—

"M. l'Abbé Gabriel then, has by his double engagement, by a deed and by an oath, confirmed his donation. Nay more," added Père d'Aigrigny; "when, to his excessive surprise, as well as our own, the enormous amount of this inheritance was disclosed, M. l'Abbé Gabriel, true to his extreme generosity, so far from repenting of his gift, did, as we may say, again consecrate them by a pious movement of gratitude towards Providence; for M. le Notarie will remember, no doubt, that, after having earnestly embraced M. l'Abbé Gabriel, and exclaimed that he was, in charity, a second Saint Vincent-de-Paul, I took him by the hand, and we thus knelt together to thank Heaven for having inspired him with the thought of making these immense riches subservient to the still greater glory of the Lord."

"That is true," replied Gabriel, frankly; "so long as I only was concerned, in spite of a moment of extreme surprise, caused by the revelation of a fortune so immense, I did not think of reclaiming the donation I made so freely."

"It was at this moment," resumed the Père d'Aigrigny, "that the hour at which the succession was to close struck. M. l'Abbé Gabriel, being the only heir present, was necessarily and perforce the sole and legitimate possessor of this enormous property,—immense, unquestionably,—and I, in my charity, rejoice that they are so immense; for, thanks to them, much misery will now have succour, many tears will now be dried up. At this moment this gentleman suddenly appears (and Père d'Aigrigny pointed to Dagobert), and under a mistake, which I excuse from the bottom of my soul, and with which I am sure he will hereafter reproach himself, assails me with threat and menace, and accuses me of having concealed, I know not when, I know not what person's relatives, in order to prevent them from being here at the proper hour."

"Yes, I do accuse you of this infamy!" exclaimed the soldier, exasperated at the calmness and audacity of the R. P.; "yes, and I will!"

"Once more, sir, I entreat you be so good as to allow me to continue—you shall have your reply," said P. d'Aigrigny, humbly, and in soft and honied tones.

"Yes, I will reply and confound you!" cried Dagobert.

"Be silent, father! be silent!" said Agricola; "you shall speak presently."

The soldier held his tongue.

The P. d'Aigrigny then went on with increased assurance,— "Unquestionably, if there be any other heirs than M. l'Abbé Gabriel, it is a sad thing for them that they did not present themselves here before the final moment. Yes, if instead of defending the cause of the wretched and needy, I was defending my own interests, I should be far from taking advantage of this result due to chance alone. But as the representative of a large family of poor brethren, I am compelled to insist upon my full claims to this inheritance, and I doubt not but M. le Notaire will admit the validity of my rights, by putting me into immediate possession of that to which I am legally and fairly entitled."

"My business," said the notary, in a tone expressive of deep emotion, "is to carry out, as fully as I can, the desire of the testator. M. l'Abbé Gabriel de Rennepont alone appeared to claim within the given time for keeping the succession open; the act of donation is strictly according to law in every respect. I have, therefore, no grounds for refusing to place the person on whom he has bestowed the fortune recently acquired by him in possession of all the funds thereunto belonging."

At these words Samuel hid his face between his hands, while confessing, with a deep groan, that, however contrary to his wishes was the decision of the notary, it was still in strict accordance with the rigour of the law.

"But, surely," cried Dagobert, addressing the notary, "you do not—you cannot—mean thus tamely to suffer two poor orphan girls to be despoiled of their rights? I address you in the name of their father—their mother—I swear to you, on my honour—the honour of a soldier—that advantage has been taken of the weakness and confidence of my wife to place the two daughters of Maréchal Simon in a convent, in order to prevent my being able to produce them here this morning. In truth of what I advance, I can assure you I have already been to lay my complaint before a magistrate."

"Well," replied the notary, "and what did he say in reply?"

"That my deposition was not sufficient to warrant his removing the young persons from the convent in which they had been placed, but that the matter should be investigated."

"Yes," added Agricola, "the same answer was made to the application respecting Mademoiselle de Cardoville, who, under a false charge of insanity, is forcibly detained in a private madhouse; notwithstanding that this young lady (who has also claims in the inheritance to be divided to-day) is in full possession of her sense and reason. I took the same steps in her behalf my father employed for the release of the daughters of Maréchal Simon."

"Well?" inquired the notary.

"Unfortunately, sir," answered Agricola, "I received a similar reply to my father's; to the effect that my deposition was not sufficient to warrant any decided measures, that my testimony was not enough to obtain an order for the young lady's freedom, but that the affair should be taken into consideration."

At this moment Bathsheba, having heard a ringing at the outer gate, at a sign from Samuel quitted the Red Chamber.

The notary then, addressing Agricola and his father, said—

"Far be it from me, my good sirs, to throw the smallest imputation on the truth and good feeling which, I doubt not, you possess; at the same time, I must candidly state that I do not find in what you have just stated, borne out as it is by no testimony but your own, sufficient grounds for staying the legal course of events: it even appearing, by your own accounts, that the judicial authorities to whom you applied did not consider themselves warranted in acting upon your simple attestation ; merely replying to your appeal by promises of making the necessary inquiries as to facts, and then consulting as to the means to be pursued. Now I put it to you, my good sirs, how can I in conscience presume to do that which duly authorised magistrates felt their power unequal to attempt ?”

“ You can—you ought !” answered Dagobert, firmly ; “ both justice and honour require it !”

“ Such, sir, may be your opinion, but, according to my own view of the case, I consider I am obeying the strictest dictates of justice and honour in scrupulously and faithfully executing the last wishes of a dying man ; besides, there are other means open for you. If the persons for whom you are concerned conceive themselves in any way aggrieved, they may institute proceedings against the parties in favour of whom M. Gabriel de Rennepont has resigned his succession : but, in the meanwhile, it becomes my positive duty to place the person on whom M. Gabriel de Rennepont has bestowed the property in immediate possession of all the monies and valuables thereunto appertaining. I should commit a great dereliction of my legal duty were I to act otherwise.”

These observations on the part of the notary seemed so completely in accordance with the rigorous injunctions of the law, that Samuel, Dagobert, and Agricola, remained speechless with grief and unavailing regret.

Gabriel, who had been buried in deep thought, seemed, after a little while, to form a desperate resolution, and addressing the notary in a firm voice, said,—

“ Since it appears, sir, that the law is in this case powerless to support the right cause, I find myself obliged to have recourse to extremities ; but before doing so, I, for the last time, inquire of M. d'Aigrigny if he will be contented to receive my portion alone of the fortune this day to be divided, upon condition that the other parts of the inheritance may be permitted to remain in safe hands until those who now claim to be admitted as participators shall have made good their title to share in it ?”

“ To this proposition,” said D'Aigrigny, “ I must reply as I have already done. It is not an affair which concerns me individually, but the immense interests of charity and benevolence are at stake ; and I am, therefore, compelled to refuse this offer on the part of M. Gabriel de Rennepont, as well as to remind him of his various engagements and undertakings.”

“ Then, sir, you reject the arrangement I propose ?” said Gabriel, in a voice of powerful emotion.

“ The voice of charity compels me so to do.”

“ You absolutely refuse ?”

“ I reflect upon all the good works that may be effected by means of this wealth, and how greatly it may be the means of promoting the glory and honour of God ; and I feel neither the inclination nor the courage to diminish it by any concessions.”

“ Then, sir,” resumed the young priest, in a voice of intense agitation, “ since you drive me to it, I revoke my donation ; I disposed only of that which I considered as my own to bestow. I had no intention of giving away that which belonged to others.”

“ Have a care, sir,” said D'Aigrigny, “ or I shall be obliged to remind you that I have in my possession your solemnly written and formal oath."

"You can only tell me that of which I am well aware, sir; namely, that you hold a paper in which I solemnly vowed never to revoke this donation under any pretext whatever, under penalty of incurring the hatred and contempt of every honest mind. Well, sir," said Gabriel, with profound bitterness, "so be it! I will expose myself to all the consequences of my perjury, which you are fully at liberty to proclaim wherever you please. I may be despised and abhorred by all, but there is One above who knows all, and will judge between us."

As the young priest uttered these words, he hastily repressed the indignant tears which rose to his eyes.

"Oh, fear not, my noble boy!" exclaimed Dagobert, in whose bosom hope once more sprung up; "all worthy people will honour and respect you for daring to do what is just and right."

"You are right, dear brother!" said Agricola; "quite—quite right in acting thus!"

"M. le Notaire," at length chimed in the sharp voice of Rodin—"M. le Notaire, have the goodness to make M. l'Abbé Gabriel understand that he may perjure himself as much and as often as he pleases, but that the civil code is less conveniently violated than a promise merely sworn to and solemnly worded."

"Proceed, sir!" said Gabriel.

"You must know, then," replied Rodin, "that a donation given from one party during his lifetime to another also living—similar to yours to M. the Rev. Father d'Aigrigny—is not revocable, except for three causes. I am right, I believe?" continued he, addressing the notary.

"Yes, sir, quite so!" answered the latter; "three reasons alone permit the revocation of such a deed of gift."

"The first," said Rodin, "is in the event of issue being born after the execution of the said deed of gift; and I almost blush to be obliged to point out to M. Gabriel how completely he is precluded from any anticipation of that contingency. The second ground for setting aside the bequest would be the ingratitude of the recipient; now M. l'Abbé Gabriel may safely reckon upon our profound and eternal gratitude. The third plea for revoking such a gift would be a failure on the part of the receiving party in carrying out the wishes and desires of the bestower, or if direct proof can be given of misappropriation of the wealth entrusted. However unworthy may be the opinion M. Gabriel may suddenly have conceived of us, at least we are entitled to ask for time to prove to his entire satisfaction that the gift bestowed has been employed in means and undertakings having for their aim and end the great glory of the Most High."

"It now rests with you, M. le Notaire," observed D'Aigrigny, "to decide and declare whether M. l'Abbé Gabriel can revoke the donation so lately made."

Just as the notary was about to reply, Bathsheba entered, followed by two fresh personages, who presented themselves in the Red Chamber almost at the same moment.

CHAPTER XI.

A GOOD GENIUS.

THE first of the two persons whose arrival had interrupted the notary's reply was Faringhea.

At the sight of this man's repulsive aspect, Samuel accosted him, and said,—

“Who are you, sir?”

After having cast a piercing glance on Rodin, who shuddered imperceptibly, and then resumed his habitual impassiveness, Faringhea replied to Samuel,— “Prince Djalma arrived a little while ago from India, in order to be here to-day, as he was requested to do by the inscription on a medal which he wore round his neck.”

“He, too!” exclaimed Gabriel, who, as we know, had been his companion, in his voyage from India, from the Azores, where the ship coming from Alexandria had put in; “he, too, an heir! I remember now that, during our passage, the prince told me that his mother was of French extraction; but, doubtless, he thought it advisable to conceal from me the object of his voyage. Oh! he is a noble and courageous youth, the young Indian prince! Where is he?”

The Strangler cast another look on Rodin, and said to him, laying a slight emphasis on his words:—

“I quitted the prince yesterday evening. He told me that, although he had a very great interest in being here, that yet it might happen that he should sacrifice that interest to other circumstances. I passed the night in the same hôtel with him, and this morning when I went to his apartment they told me that he had already gone out. My friendship for him has made me come to this house, hoping that the information I could give as to the prince might, perhaps, not be useless.”

Not saying a word as to the ambush into which he had fallen the previous evening, being silent with respect to the Rodin machinations against Djalma, and, above all, in attributing the absence of the prince to a voluntary cause, the Strangler wished evidently to serve the socius, relying that Rodin would recompense his discretion.

It is useless to say that Faringhea told a barefaced lie. After having contrived in the morning to escape from his prison by a marvellous display of cunning, skill, and boldness, he had hastened to the hôtel where he had left Djalma. There he had learnt that a man and woman of middle age and a respectable appearance, representing themselves as the relatives of the young Indian, had asked to see him, and, alarmed at the fearful somnolence in which he seemed plunged, they had conveyed him into a carriage in order to take him to their own house, and pay him the attention he required.

“It is much to be deplored,” said the notary, “that this heir did not also present himself; but he is, unfortunately, deprived of his rights to the share of the immense inheritance which we have met to arrange.”

“Oh! it is a question of an immense inheritance, is it?” said

Faringhea, looking steadfastly at Rodin, who prudently turned away his face.

The second of the two persons we have mentioned entered at this moment.

It was the father of Marshal Simon : a tall old man, still active and vigorous for his years ; his hair was white and short ; and his face, which was healthily coloured, betokened at once ability, amenity, and firmness.

Agricola went up to him with a rapid step.

"What you here, M. Simon?" he exclaimed.

"Yes, my lad!" said the marshal's father, shaking Agricola cordially by the hand; "I have this moment come off a journey. M. Hardy was to have been here in a matter of an inheritance, as he supposes, but as he is still absent from Paris for some time, he has authorised me to——"

"He, too, an heir! M. François Hardy?" exclaimed Agricola, interrupting the old workman.

"Why how pale and disturbed you seem, my boy! what ails you?" inquired the marshal's father, looking about him with astonishment. "What is the matter here?"

"The matter here? why, one that concerns your little girls, whom they are seeking to despoil!" exclaimed Dagobert, despairingly, and going towards the superintendent. "And it was to be present at this infamous proceeding that I have brought them from the further limits of Siberia."

"You!" exclaimed the old workman, endeavouring to call to mind the features of the soldier. "Who, then, are you?"

"Dagobert!"

"You—you—so generously devoted to my son!" exclaimed the marshal's father; and he clasped the old soldier's hand between his own with great warmth. "But did you not allude to Simon's daughter?"

"Daughters! for he is more happy than he yet knows of," said Dagobert; "the poor dear girls are twins."

"And where are they?"

"In a convent."

"In a convent?"

"Yes, through the treachery of that man, who, by detaining them there, has disinherited them."

"What man?"

"The Marquis d'Aigrigny."

"My son's most deadly enemy!" exclaimed the old workman, casting a look of hatred on the Père d'Aigrigny, whose boldness did not forsake him.

"And this is not all," added Agricola. "M. Hardy, my worthy and excellent employer, is also unfortunately deprived of his claim to this immense inheritance."

"What say you?" exclaimed Marshal Simon's father. "But M. Hardy was ignorant that this was an affair of such deep interest and importance to him, and departed hastily to rejoin a friend who sent for him urgently."

At each of these successive disclosures, Samuel felt his despair increase: but he could only vent his feelings in groans; for, unfortunately, the will of the testator was formal.

Père d'Aigrigny, impatient to put an end to this scene, which cruelly embarrassed him in spite of his apparent calm, said to the notary in a grave and emphatic tone:

"Sir, all this surely must have an end. If calumny could reach me, I would reply to it triumphantly by the facts as they appear before us. Why attribute to hateful plots the absence of the heirs in whose names this soldier and his son make such injurious accusations? Why should their absence be more unaccountable than that of this young Indian? than that of M. Hardy? who, as his man of business says, was ignorant of the importance of the interest which called him hither. Is it not more probable that the daughters of M. the Marshal Simon, and Mademoiselle Cardoville, have not been able, from some equally natural causes, to present themselves here this morning? Once again I say that this has gone on too long, and I believe that the notary thinks as I do, that this revelation of fresh heirs really can effect no change in the question which I had the honour to put to him just now; that is, that, as representative of the poor, to whom M. the Abbé Gabriel has made a gift of all he possessed, I remain, in spite of his tardy and illegal opposition, sole possessor of the property; which I have already pledged myself, and I repeat that pledge in the face of all at this solemn moment, to employ for the greater glory of the Lord. Will you, therefore, sir, as the official notary, at once give a decisive opinion, and terminate a scene which must be most painful to all?"

"Sir," replied the notary in a solemn voice, "on my soul and conscience, in the name of justice and law, as faithful and impartial executor of the last wishes of M. Marius de Rennepont, I declare that, by the act of donation of M. l'Abbé Gabriel de Rennepont, you are—you, Monsieur l'Abbé d'Aigrigny—the sole possessor of this property, of which at this moment I put you in possession, in order that you may dispose of it according to the conditions of the donor."

These words, pronounced with emphasis and seriousness, utterly destroyed the last and vague hopes which the defenders of the heirs could have left to them.

Samuel became paler than ever, and grasped the hand of Bathsheba, who stood beside him convulsively, whilst big tears flowed slowly down the cheeks of the old couple.

Dagobert and Agricola were plunged in deepest grief, struck by the reasoning of the notary, who said that he could give no more credit or authority to their claims than the magistrates had done, and they felt that they had not a shadow of a hope remaining.

Gabriel suffered most acutely of any person: he experienced the most bitter remorse, when he reflected that by his blindness he had been the cause and involuntary instrument of this abominable spoliation.

Thus when the notary, after having assured himself of the correctness and amount of the securities enclosed in the cedar coffer, said to M. Père d'Aigrigny,—

"Take possession of this casket, sir!"

Gabriel exclaimed, with the bitter tone of deep despair,—

"Alas! it would seem that in these circumstances an inexorable fatality weighs down all who are worthy of interest, affection, and respect. Oh, my God!" added the young priest, clasping his hands fervently; "your sovereign justice cannot permit the triumph of such iniquity!"

It would seem that Heaven heard the missionary's prayer. Scarcely had he spoken than a singular circumstance occurred.

Rodin, without awaiting the conclusion of Gabriel's invocation, had, according to the authority of the notary, taken the casket in his arms, unable at the same time to repress a loud aspiration of joy and triumph.

At this moment, too, when Père d'Aigriguy and the socius believed themselves at last possessors of the treasure, the door of the apartment in which they had heard the clock strike suddenly opened.

A female appeared on the threshold.

At the sight of her Gabriel uttered a loud cry, and remained thunderstruck.

Samuel and Bathsheba clasped their hands and fell on their knees. The two Israelites felt reanimated by an inexplicable hope.

All the other actors in this scene remained motionless with astonishment.

Rodin himself retreated two paces, and replaced the casket on the table with a trembling hand.

Although there was nothing but what was very natural in this incident—a woman appearing on the threshold of a door which she had just opened; yet there was a moment of silence—profound—solemn. Every breast was oppressed—palpitating. In fact all, at the sight of this female, experienced a surprise mingled with a deadly fear—indefinable anguish—for this female appeared the living original of the portrait placed in this salon a hundred and fifty years previously.

There was the same head-dress, the same gown, with its long hanging folds, the same features, impressed with that deep and resigned sorrow.

This female advanced slowly, and without appearing to perceive the profound impression caused by her appearance.

She approached a secrétaire inlaid with brass and silver, pressed a concealed spring hidden amidst the gilt mouldings, and a small drawer sprang out, whence she took an envelope of sealed parchment; then advancing to the table, she placed this paper before the notary, who, till then mute and motionless, took it mechanically.

After having cast a long look, melancholy but most sweet, at Gabriel, who seemed fascinated at her presence, this female went towards the door of the vestibule, which was open.

As she passed by Samuel and Bathsheba, who were still kneeling, she paused for a moment, bent her beautiful head towards the old couple, looked at them with tender solicitude, and then, after having given them her hands to kiss, she disappeared as slowly as she had appeared, having cast a parting look at Gabriel.

The departure of this female seemed to break the charm under which all present had remained for some minutes.

Gabriel first broke silence by murmuring, in a broken tone,—

"It is she! she again!—here—in this house!"

"Who—she—brother?" asked Agricola, alarmed at the paleness and almost distracted air of the missionary; for the smith, though he had not yet observed the singular resemblance of this female to the portrait, shared, without being able to account for it, in the general amazement.

Dagobert and Faringhea were in a similar state of mind.

"Who is this female?" continued Agricola, taking Gabriel's hand, which was damp and cold.

"Look!" replied the young priest; "it is more than a century and a half since those portraits were placed there."

And he pointed to the two paintings before which he was then sitting.

At Gabriel's movement, Agricola, Dagobert, and Faringhea, raised their eyes towards the two pictures placed on each side of the mantel-piece.

All three exclaimed at once:

"It is she!—the same woman!" cried the astonished smith; "and her portrait has been here for a hundred and fifty years!"

"What do I see?—the friend and emissary of Marshal Simon!" said Dagobert, contemplating the portrait of the man. "Yes, it is really the face of him who came to find us in Siberia last year. Ah! I recognise him by his sad and soft look, as well as by his eyebrows, which unite in one over his brow."

"My eyes do not deceive me!—no! it is indeed the man with his eyebrows arched into one, that we strangled and buried in the banks of the Ganges!" muttered Faringhea, with a shudder of fear: "the man whom one of the sons of Bohwanie last year, at Java, in the ruins of Tchandi, declared he had met after his murder near one of the gates of Bombay! This accursed man, who, as they said, left every where after him death in his traces! And this painting was done a century and a half ago!"

And the Strangler, as well as Dagobert and Agricola, could not take his eyes off from this remarkable portrait.

"What a mysterious resemblance!" thought Père d'Aigrigny; and then, as if struck with a sudden idea, he said to Gabriel, "But this woman is the same who saved your life in America?"

"It is the same," replied Gabriel, shuddering; "and still she told me that she was going towards the north of America," added the young priest, speaking to himself.

"How then could she be in this house?" asked Père d'Aigrigny, addressing himself to Samuel. "Answer me, guardian: was this woman brought here before us, or by you?"

"I entered here the first of any present and alone, when, for the first time for a century and a half, the door was opened," said Samuel gravely.

"Then how do you account for this female's presence here?" added Père d'Aigrigny.

"I seek not to explain," said the Jew: "I see, and seeing believe; and even venture now to hope," continued he, regarding Bathsheba with an indefinable expression.

"Still it is your duty to account for the presence of this female among us," said D'Aigrigny, over whose mind a vague sense of uneasiness was rapidly stealing. "Again, I ask you—who is she? and why is she here?"

"All I can tell you, sir, is that, according to what I have heard from my father, there are underground communications from this house to the most distant parts of the neighbourhood."

"Ah! then all is easily explained," said D'Aigrigny. "We have now only to ascertain what motive this person could possibly have had in thus introducing herself into the house. As for her singular resemblance to the portrait, that is a mere freak of nature."

Rodin had participated in the general astonishment at the appearance of the mysterious female; but when he saw her deliver a sealed packet to the notary, the socius ceased to trouble himself respecting the strangeness of her coming, and thought only of quitting the place as quickly as possible, in company with the casket containing the treasure, now legally and incontestably the property of the Company of Jesus: an instinctive dread made him fear the contents of the sealed envelope delivered to the notary, who still mechanically grasped it in his hands.

The deep amazement and profound silence which prevailed appeared to the socius to afford a favourable opportunity of escaping from the room unobserved, he therefore lightly touched the elbow of D'Aigrigny, explaining by a significant gesture what he was about to do; then placing the cedar casket beneath his arm proceeded towards the door.

"One moment, sir, if you please," said Samuel, rising and intercepting his passage. "I must request M. le Notaire to examine the paper just put into his hands; you can leave the room after he has so done."

"But, sir," said Rodin, striving to force his way out, "as the point in dispute has been finally decided in favour of M. d'Aigrigny, I will thank you to stand aside."

"And I tell you, sir," returned the old man, in a loud and vehement tone, "that I will not suffer that casket to be removed out of this room until M. le Notaire has taken cognisance of the paper just delivered to him."

Samuel's words and manner, so expressive of determined opposition to Rodin's carrying off the treasure, attracted such universal attention, that the socius found himself most unwillingly compelled to return to the table; but, while passing the Jew, bestowed upon him such a withering look of implacable hatred as made the old man shudder, spite of the natural firmness of his disposition. The notary, in compliance with Samuel's desire, proceeded carefully to examine the envelope of the sealed packet.

"Merciful heavens!" exclaimed he; "what is this I see? But so much the better!"

As these words escaped the notary, all eyes were turned inquiringly towards him.

"Oh, proceed, sir—I conjure you to proceed!" cried Samuel, clasping his hands; "perhaps my presentiments will be realised."

"Pray, sir," said D'Aigrigny, beginning to experience the same disquietude as Rodin, "allow me to inquire what paper is that you are so anxiously perusing?"

"A codicil," replied the notary. "A codicil which leaves every thing unsettled for the present."

"How, sir!" exclaimed D'Aigrigny, furiously, and approaching the notary. "Every thing left undecided! and by what right, pray?"

"Impossible!" added Rodin. "We shall oppose any such delay."

"Gabriel! father! listen!" cried Agricola; "all is not lost, there are still hopes. Gabriel, do you hear what the notary says? There are yet hopes for us."

"What is this?" asked the young priest, hastily rising, and as though unable to trust to the evidence of his senses.

"Gentlemen, said the notary, I will thank you to attend while I read aloud the superscription to this packet, which changes, or at least defers, all former testamentary dispositions."

"Gabriel, my brother!" shouted Agricola, throwing himself into the arms of the missionary; "every thing is deferred, and nothing lost!"

"Listen, gentlemen," said the notary; and then, in a clear and audible voice, he read as follows:—

"This is a codicil which (for reasons that will be detailed within) adjourns or prorogues, till the 1st of June, 1832, the dispositions mentioned in the will made by me this day at one o'clock; without, however, changing or destroying any of the testamentary gifts or obligations therein stated, but merely deferring their fulfilment for the time specified.

"I desire that the house may be again closed, and the capital, with all other monies and securities, be left in the hands of their present depositary, in order that they may be fairly and equitably divided on the 1st of June, among all such of my family as shall make good their claims.

"MARIUS DE RENNEPONT."

"Villetaneuse, this 13th February, 1682,

"at 11 o'clock in the evening."

"I protest against this codicil!" cried D'Aigrigny, livid with rage and despair. "The female who gave it into the hands of the notary is believed by us to be unworthy of credit—this codicil is forged!"

"You are mistaken, sir," said the notary, sternly; "I have carefully and closely examined the two signatures to this paper and the first will, and I am persuaded they are the same. Besides, the remark I made some time since respecting those heirs not now present, is equally applicable to yourself. You are at liberty to dispute the authenticity of this document; but every thing must remain in abeyance, and as not having yet come to pass—the period for deciding the claims of those presenting themselves as heirs being now removed to the 1st of June, a distance of three months and a half."

By the time the notary had spoken these words, the nails of Rodin were streaming with blood, and, for the first time, his pale, corpse-like lips were coloured with crimson.

"Mercy has interposed!" cried Gabriel, kneeling and clasping his hands with religious fervour, while his beaming countenance was turned towards heaven; "my prayer has been answered; sovereign justice would not thus permit the wicked to prosper, or their iniquity to prevail against the innocent."

"What are you saying, my dear boy?" asked Dagobert, who, bewildered by the sudden joy which had thus broken in upon them, scarcely comprehended the import of the disputed codicil.

"All is put off, father!" exclaimed the smith; "the period for the presentation of the heirs is now fixed three months and a half from this period. And, now that these persons (pointing to Rodin and D'Aigrigny) are unmasked, there is nothing more to be feared from them; we shall be on our guard against their machinations, and the orphans, Mademoiselle Cardoville, my worthy employer M. Hardy, and the young Indian, will all receive their just share."

* * * * *

We must renounce all attempts to paint the joy and rapturous delight of Gabriel, Agricola, Dagobert, the father of the Maréchal Simon, Samuel, and Bathsheba.

Faringhea alone remained gloomy and silent before the portrait of the man with the remarkable eyebrows.

The rage, the impotent fury, of D'Aigrigny and Rodin, at seeing Samuel resume the possession of the cedar casket, is beyond the power of our pen to describe; we renounce it, as a task of utter impossibility.

By the advice of the notary, who took the codicil with him, in order that it might be opened with all legal formality, Samuel determined, as more prudent, to place in the Bank of France the immense treasures of which he was known to be the guardian.

While the generous hearts, so lately bowed down by grief and despair, overflowed with joyful hope and happiness, D'Aigrigny and Rodin quitted the house, carrying rage and almost madness in their hearts.

As the reverend Father d'Aigrigny ascended his carriage, he commanded himself sufficiently to say, in a tone of assumed calmness, to the servant who stood waiting to close the door of the vehicle—"Drive to the Hôtel de Saint-Dizier!" Then, overcome and utterly prostrate in mind and hope, he threw himself back on the cushions, and, covering his face with his hands, uttered deep and heavy groans; while Rodin, seated with him, surveyed, with mingled curiosity and contempt, the miserable and dejected creature now before him.

"The poor pusillanimous coward!" said he, mentally; "he despairs, while I——"

* * * * *

At the end of a quarter of an hour the carriage reached the Rue de Babylone and drove into the court-yard of the Hôtel de Saint-Dizier.

CHAPTER XII.

THE FIRST LAST, AND THE LAST FIRST.

THE carriage of the Père d'Aigrigny reached the Hôtel de Saint-Dizier at a rapid pace.

During the time Rodin remained perfectly silent, contenting himself with looking at and listening to Père d'Aigrigny, who breathed forth the pains and agonies of his overthrow in a lengthened monologue, interspersed with exclamations, lamentations, and indignation, at the pitiless blows of destiny which, in a moment, ruined the best-founded hopes.

When the Père d'Aigrigny's carriage entered the court-yard, and stopped at the peristyle of the Hôtel de Saint-Dizier, the face of the princess might be seen through the glass of one of the windows, half concealed by the folds of a curtain. In her intense anxiety, she had placed herself there to see if it were the Abbé d'Aigrigny who had arrived. Still further, overlooking all ceremony, that great lady, whose demeanour was usually so reserved and formal, quitted the room hastily, and came down several of the stairs in order to meet Père d'Aigrigny, who was ascending them with an air of deep dejection.

The princess, when she saw the livid and depressed appearance of the R. Père's face, suddenly paused and turned pale, at once suspecting that all was lost. A rapid glance exchanged with her quondam lover left her no doubt on the result she had so much dreaded.

Rodin humbly followed the R. Père. Both, preceded by the princess, entered quickly into a private apartment.

The door closed, the princess, addressing the Père d'Aigrigny with intense anguish, exclaimed,—

“What, then, has happened?”

Instead of replying to this question, the R. Père, his eyes sparkling with rage, his lips white, and his features convulsed, looked the princess full in the face, and said to her,—

“Do you know the amount of this inheritance which we believed to amount to forty millions?” (1,600,000*l.*)

“I see now,” replied the princess, “we have been deceived: this inheritance is reduced to nothing—you have been working only for a great loss.”

“Yes, we have worked for a great loss,” replied the R. Père, his teeth clenched passionately, “an enormous loss! Why, the inheritance in question was not forty millions, but two hundred and twelve millions!”

“Two hundred and twelve millions!” repeated the princess, receding a step in utter amazement; “that is impossible.”

“I saw them in actual securities in a casket, and checked by the notary.”

“Two hundred and twelve millions!” repeated the astonished princess; “why, that is an immense, a sovereign power! And you have given it up—have not struggled, by every possible means, to the very last instant?”

“Madame, I did all I could, in spite of the treachery of Gabriel, who this very morning declared that he renounced us—that he would dissociate himself from the company!”

“The ingrate!” said the princess.

“The act of donation which I had the precaution to have legalised by the notary was so formal, that, in spite of the assertions and claims of the savage soldier and his son, the notary had actually put me in possession of this treasure.”

“Two hundred and twelve millions!” repeated the princess, clasping her hands. “In truth, it is like a dream.”

"Yes," replied Père d'Aigrigny, bitterly; "for us this possession has been a dream, for we have discovered a codicil which postpones for three months and a half all testamentary dispositions: but now the alarm is given, even by our own precautions, to the whole body of heirs. They know the vastness of the sum, are on their guard, and all is lost."

"Who, then, is the cursed creature who has made this codicil known?"

"A woman."

"What woman?"

"I do not know; but some wandering creature whom Gabriel declares he met in America, and who then saved his life."

"And how did this woman get there? How did she know the existence of this codicil?"

"I believe it was all concocted by that wretch of a Jew, the keeper of the house, whose family has been the depositary of the funds for three generations: no doubt he had some secret instructions in case it should be suspected that the heirs were kept back; for, in his will, this Marius de Rennepont anticipated that the company would keep watch over his descendants."

"But cannot you enter pleadings against the validity of this codicil?"

"Pleadings! what, at such a time as this?—Pleadings in a matter of a will! Why, we should assuredly expose ourselves to a thousand clamours, without the certainty of success! It is already sufficiently injurious to us, that all these facts will be noised abroad. Ah, it is horrible! and at the very moment of success, after so much labour!—an affair followed up so carefully, so pertinaciously, for a hundred and fifty years!"

"Two hundred and twelve millions!" repeated the princess. "And it was not in a strange land that the order would then have established itself, but in France itself—in the heart of France itself—with such vast resources!"

"Yes," responded Père d'Aigrigny, with bitterness; "and by education we should have got hold of the rising generation. It was, politically, of incalculable extent." Then, striking his foot angrily on the floor, he added,—"I tell you it is enough to make one go mad with rage! An affair so skilfully, so sagaciously, so patiently conducted!"

"Have you no hope, then?"

"The only one is, that this Gabriel does not retract his donation. That will be a considerable sum,—it will amount at least to thirty millions!"

"That is a vast sum; almost as much as you had expected. Why, then, do you despair?"

"Because it is evident Gabriel will appeal against this donation: however legal it may be, he will find some means of annulling it, now that he is free, has his eyes opened with respect to us, and is surrounded by his adopted family. I tell you all is lost; and there is not a shadow of a hope left. I even think it prudent to write to Rome, to obtain permission to leave Paris for a time. This city has become hateful to me."

"Yes, yes,—I see it all; and there is not a hope left when you, my friend, resolve almost to fly."

And the Père d'Aigrigny remained completely overwhelmed, baffled, hopeless, unstrung. This heavy blow had broken every spring, every energy of his mind, and, crushed and annihilated, he flung himself into an arm-chair.

During this conversation, Rodin had remained standing respectfully near the door, holding his old hat in his hand.

Two or three times, at certain passages in the conversation of Père d'Aigrigny and the princess, the cadaverous countenance of the socius, which appeared a prey to concentrated wrath, was slightly coloured, his flaccid eyelids becoming as red as if the blood had mounted to his head in consequence of a violent internal struggle; then his inexpressive face resumed its dull character.

"I must write to Rome instantly, to announce this defeat, which becomes an event of the highest importance, inasmuch as it destroys such immense hopes," said the Père d'Aigrigny, with a tone of despair.

The R. P. was still sitting; and pointing to a table he added, in an abrupt and altered voice,—

"Write ——!"

The socius, putting his hat on the ground, replied by a respectful bow to the order of the R. P.; and with his neck stooping, his head lowered, and sidelong step, he went to seat himself in the chair placed in front of a bureau: then taking pen and paper, he, silent and motionless, awaited the dictation of his superior.

"By your leave, princess?" said the Père d'Aigrigny to Madame de Saint-Dizier.

She replied by an impatient gesture, which seemed to reproach Père d'Aigrigny with his ceremonious request.

The R. P. bowed, and then dictated as follows, with a low and half-stifled voice:—

"All our hopes, which had become almost certainties, have been suddenly crushed. The Rennepont affair, in spite of every care and all skill bestowed up to this period, has completely and hopelessly failed. The turn which matters have taken is, unfortunately, even worse than a want of success; it is an event the more disastrous for the company, whose rights to the property were decidedly and morally evident, for they had been fraudulently withheld at a time when a confiscation had been made in favour of the company: but I have at least the consciousness of having done every thing, up to the last moment, to defend and assure our rights. But, I repeat, we must consider this important affair as absolutely and for ever lost, and think no more about it ——"

The Père d'Aigrigny dictated this with his back turned to Rodin.

At the abrupt movement which the socius made in rising, and throwing his pen down on the table instead of continuing to write, the R. Père turned round, and looking at Rodin with profound astonishment, said to him,—

"Well! what are you about?"

"There must be an end to this, incompetent and impotent man!!" said Rodin, speaking to himself, and advancing towards the mantelpiece slowly.

"What! you leave your seat, and do not go on writing?" said the R. P., much astonished. And then turning to the princess, who participated in his surprise, he added, with a contemptuous glance at the socius, "Really, he has lost his wits!"

"Excuse him," replied Madame de Saint-Dizier; "it is, no doubt, the anxiety which the failure of this affair has caused him!"

"Thank the princess, return to your place, and continue your writing," said Père d'Aigrigny to Rodin, in a tone of disdainful contempt, and pointing to the table imperiously with his finger.

The socius, entirely regardless of this new order, came close to the fireplace, to which he turned his back, elevated his drooping shoulders, stood erect on his legs, struck the carpet with the heel of his thick and oiled shoes, crossed his hands behind the skirts of his old greasy coat, and, raising his head, looked sternly at Père d'Aigrigny.

The socius had not uttered a word, but his hideous features, at the moment slightly suffused, revealed fully and instantaneously such a consciousness of his superiority, and so sovereign a contempt for Père d'Aigrigny,—an audacity so calm, and as it were so serene, that the R. P. and the princess were confounded.

They felt singularly controlled by, and under the domination of, this little old man, so ugly and so squalid.

Père d'Aigrigny knew too well the customs of his order to believe his humble secretary capable of so suddenly assuming these airs of utter superiority without motive, or rather, without positive right: late, too late, the R. P. discovered that this subordinate might be at the same time a spy, and a sort of experienced auxiliary, who, by the constitution of the order, had power and authority in certain urgent cases to supersede, and temporarily replace the unfit, with whom he was placed, in the first instance, as surveillant.

The R. P. was not mistaken: from the general to the lowest rural subordinate, even the very heads of colleges, all the superior members of the company, have near them, often concealed in functions apparently the most humble, men fully competent to fulfil their duties at a moment's notice; and who, thus instructed, correspond continually and directly with Rome.

From the instant when Rodin had thus planted himself, the usually haughty demeanour of Père d'Aigrigny changed suddenly; and, although it cost him an enormous effort, he yet said with a hesitation of manner, filled with deference,—

"You have, doubtless, the power to command me—me, who but now commanded you?"

Rodin, without reply, drew from his thick and shabby pocket-book a folded paper stamped on both sides, on which were written some lines in Latin.

After having read this, Père d'Aigrigny lifted it respectfully, reverentially, to his lips, and then restoring it to Rodin made him a low bow.

When Père d'Aigrigny raised his head, it was purple with spite and shame: notwithstanding his habit of passive obedience, and immutable respect for the commands of his order, he experienced a bitter and violent sensation of anger at finding himself so suddenly deposed from his superiority. This was not all: although, for a very long time, all thoughts of gallantry between himself and Madame de Saint-Dizier had ceased, still she was not the less a female in his eyes; and to undergo this degrading check before a woman was doubly galling to him, who, despite his order, had not yet entirely cast off every sentiment of a man of the world.

Besides, the princess, instead of appearing pained, agonised, at the sudden metamorphosis of a superior into a subaltern, and from a subaltern into a superior, looked at Rodin with a sort of curiosity, mingled with interest.

As a woman—and a woman, too, inordinately ambitious, seeking to attach to herself all powerful influences, the princess loved such contrasts: she found it really curious and interesting to see this man almost in rags, mean, and ignobly ugly, and but just now the most humble of subordinates, spring at once into an elevation of mastery, with all the dignity which his newly assumed position acquired, controlling the Père d'Aigrigny, a nobleman by birth, elegant in his manners, and formerly the most distinguished man in all societies. From that instant, as an important personage, Rodin completely effaced the Père d'Aigrigny in the mind of the princess.

The first sentiment of humiliation passed, the R. P. d'Aigrigny, although his pride was bleeding from the quick, evinced the contrary, by a ready sacrifice of self-love and worldly wisdom, his desire to redouble his courtesy towards Rodin, become his superior by so sudden a stroke of fortune.

But the ex-socius, incapable of appreciating, or rather of recognising, these delicate shadings, established himself at once coarsely and imperiously in his new position; not by the reaction of wounded pride, but by the consciousness of his actual value: a long connexion with Père d'Aigrigny had revealed to him his inferiority.

"You have thrown away the pen," said Père d'Aigrigny to Rodin, with extreme deference, "whilst I was dictating to you this despatch for Rome. Will you favour me by informing me in what respect I have acted wrongly?"

"In a moment," said Rodin, in his sharp and cutting tone. "For a long time, although this affair appeared to me wholly beyond your abilities, I refrained: yet what blunders! what poverty of invention! How coarse the means employed to reach the wished-for end!"

"I can hardly comprehend your reproaches," responded the Père d'Aigrigny, softly, although a secret bitterness pierced through his affected submission. "Was not success certain but for the codicil? Have you not yourself contributed to the measures for which you now blame me?"

"You then commanded, and I obeyed; and, moreover, you were on the point of succeeding, not because of the means you employed, but in spite of those means, if clumsy conduct and disgusting stupidity——"

"Sir, you are severe," said Père d'Aigrigny.

"I am just. Did it require any vast ability to shut a person up in a room and then to double-lock the door? Eh? Well, what else have you done? Why, nothing! The daughters of General Simon?—Imprisoned at Leipsic, shut up in a convent in Paris. Adrienne de Cardoville?—Shut up. Couche-tout-Nu?—In prison. Djalma?—A narcotic. The only piece of ingenuity, and a thousand times more sure, because it operated morally and not materially, was employed to get M. Hardy away. As to your other arrangements—pooh! bad, uncertain, dangerous! Why? because they were violent, and people reply to violence by violence: then it is no longer the struggle of clever, skilful, resolute men, who see the road they take though it is in shadow, but it is a struggle of wrestlers in open daylight. What! Why, as well as acting incessantly, we ought, beyond every thing, to keep ourselves out of sight in the back-ground; and yet you hit upon nothing more clever than to call attention to us by means of most horrible coarseness and disturbance! By way of being more mysterious, it is the guard, the commissary of police, and gaolers, whom you select as your accomplices! It is really pitiable, sir; and a remarkable success alone could excuse you for such an amount of poverty-stricken invention: but this success you have not acquired!”

“Sir,” said Père d’Aigrigny, deeply wounded, for Madame de Saint-Dizier could not disguise her admiration at the plain and cutting language of Rodin, and looked at her old admirer with an air which seemed to say—he is right! “Sir, you are more than severe in your judgment; and, in spite of the deference due to you, I tell you I am not used to such language.”

“There are many other things, ma foi, which you are not used to,” said Rodin, harshly, and interrupting the R. P.; “but you will get used to them. Up to this time you have had a false estimate of your own value; there are in you still some remains of the old leaven of the soldier and the man of the world, which work upon you, and deprive your reason of the coolness, clearness, and penetration which ought to characterise it: you have been a gay, gallant officer, all fine and scented; you have run through a course of war, fêtes, pleasures, and women—they have used up the better half of you. You will now never be any thing but a subaltern. You have been tried and found wanting. You will always lack that vigour, that concentration of mind, which controls men and events. If I have this vigour, this concentration of mind—and I have it!—do you know why? it is because, solely devoted to the service of our company, I have always been ugly, dirty, and one-minded—yes, one-minded; and in that consists my power.”

As he said these words with proud cynicism, Rodin was really fearful to look upon. The Princess de Saint-Dizier thought him almost handsome in his boldness and energy. The Père d’Aigrigny, feeling himself mastered in an unconquerable manner by this fiendish being, resolved to try one last effort at revolt, and exclaimed,—

“Well, sir, these vauntings are no proofs of worth and power: we shall see you at work?”

“You shall see me,” replied Rodin, calmly; “and do you know what work?” (Rodin was partial to this interrogative formula.) “At that which you have thrown up in so dastardly a manner!”

“What do you say?” exclaimed the Princess de Saint-Dizier; for Père d'Aigrigny, stupified at Rodin's audacity, could not utter a syllable.

"I say," replied Rodin, slowly,—"I say, that I will undertake to carry out the affair of the Rennepont inheritance with success, though you consider it as desperate!"

"You?" exclaimed Père d'Aigrigny, "you ——?"

"I!"

"But all our plans are unmasked!"

"So much the better; we shall be compelled to invent others more skilful."

"But they will mistrust you!"

"So much the better; difficult enterprises are the most sure!"

"How? Do you hope to make Gabriel consent not to revoke his donation, which it is possible may, moreover, be illegal?"

"I will bring in to the coffers of the company the two hundred and twelve millions which they seek to defraud us of. Is that clear?"

"It is as clear as that it is impossible."

"I tell you—and mind I say it—it is quite possible; and I tell you it must be possible. Do you hear? You do not understand with your mental shortsightedness!" exclaimed Rodin, becoming so animated that his cadaverous features were suffused with red. "You do not understand that the thing is no longer doubtful either; the two hundred and twelve millions will be ours, and then we are assured of the re-establishment of our sovereign influence in France: for with such sums in these times of venality a government is to be bought; and if its purchase is too dear, or it is troublesome, we can kindle a civil war and overthrow it, and restore legitimacy, which, after all, is our true middle course, and which, sooner than any thing else, would strengthen and consolidate us."

"That is evident," said the princess, clasping her hands in admiration.

"If, on the contrary," continued Rodin, "these two hundred and twelve millions remain in the hands of the Rennepont family, it will be our ruin, our annihilation,—it is to create a stock of inflexible, implacable enemies. You have not yet comprehended the execrable wishes of this Rennepont on the subject of this association, which he desires to be formed, and which, by an unheard-of fatality, his accursed race may marvellously realise! Only think of the immense power which will concentrate itself around these millions! it is the Marshal Simon acting in the name of his daughters; that is to say, the man of the people made a duke, without, perhaps, being vain of it, which assures his influence with the masses: for the military spirit and incarnate Buonapartism still represent the highest honour and national glory in the eyes of the people. Then we have this François Hardy, the liberal, independent, enlightened employer, the type of the extensive manufacturer, bent on the progress and well-being of the working classes! Then there is Gabriel, the good priest, as they call him, the primitive apostle of the Gospel, the representative of the democracy of the Church, as opposed to the aristocracy of the Church—the poor village curate against the rich bishop; that is to say, in their jargon, the labourer of the holy vineyard against the idle pluralist; the born propagator of all ideas of fraternity, emancipation, and progress, as they also call him; and that, not in the name of any revolutionary or demagogical system of politics, but in the name of Christ, in the name of a religion all charity, love, and peace,—to speak as they speak. Next, we have Adrienne de Cardoville, the type of elegance, grace, and beauty, the priestess of all the passions of the senses, which she pretends to spiritualise by force of refining, cultivating, and training them. I do not speak to you of her mind, her audacity, you know these too well. Thus, nothing can be so dangerous for us as she may become—she, a patrician by blood, a democrat in heart, and a poet in imagination. Then comes the Prince Djalma, chivalrous, bold, and ready for every thing, because he does not know any thing of civilised life; implacable in his hatred as in his affection, a powerful instrument for the hand that knows how to wield him. In fact, there is not one in this detestable family, down to the wretch Couche-tout-Nu, who, isolated, is insignificant, but who, powerful, elevated, regenerated, by contact with these generous and expansive dispositions, as they call them, may have a large share in the influences of this association, as representing the artisan. Now, do you believe that if all these persons, already exasperated against us, because, they say, we seek to spoliage them, follow out,—and they will follow out, I will answer for it—the hateful wishes of this Rennepont;—do you think, that if they associate in all their strength, and all the power with which this enormous fortune invests them, which will add an hundred-fold to their strength;—do you believe, that if they declare a war of extermination against us and our principles, that they will not become the most dangerous antagonists that we have ever had? But I tell you, I say that the company has never been more seriously assailed: yes, and it is now a question of its life or death. At this moment we have nothing worth defending ourselves; but we must attack, in order to annihilate, this accursed race of the Renneponts, and obtain possession of these millions.”

At this picture, presented by Rodin with feverish animation, the more impressive and potent as it was so rare, the princess and the Père d'Aigrigny looked at him amazed and overcome.

“I confess,” said the R. P. to Rodin, “I had not thought of all the dangerous consequences of this association for good, as advised by M. de Rennepont; but I think that these heirs, from their characters, which we know, will have the strongest desire to realise this Utopia. The peril is very great, very threatening; but how to avert it—What are we to do?”

“What, sir? You have to act upon ignorant, heroic, and exalted natures like Djalma; on sensitive and eccentric minds, like Adrienne de Cardoville; simple and ingenuous minds like Rose and Blanche Simon; upright and frank ones like François Hardy; angelic and pure like Gabriel; brutalised and sensual like Couche-tout-Nu; and yet you ask, ‘What are we to do?’”

“I really do not understand you,” said the Père d'Aigrigny.

“Of course you do not; that is very evident from your past conduct,” replied Rodin, contemptuously. “You have had recourse to coarse and substantial means, instead of acting upon so many noble, generous, elevated passions, which, one day combined, will found a formidable union; but which, now divided and isolated, will be swayed by every surprise, every seduction, every inducement, every attack! Do you understand now?—No! What, not yet?” and Rodin shrugged his shoulders. “Well, then, do people die of despair?”

“Yes!”

“The gratitude of happy love will, perhaps, go to the last limits of most absurd generosity?”

“Yes!”

“Are there not deceptions so horrid that suicide is the only refuge against such fearful realities?”

“Yes!”

“May not the excess of sensuality conduct us to the grave in slow and voluptuous agony?”

“Yes!”

“Are there not in life circumstances so terrible that the most worldly, firm, or impious characters, will blindly throw themselves, broken and exhausted, into the arms of religion, and abandon the greatest possessions of this world for hair-cloth shirt, the prayer, and the holy rapture?”

“Yes!”

“Are there not, in fine, a thousand circumstances in which the reaction of the passions leads to the most extraordinary transformations, the most tragical terminations, in the existence of man or woman?”

“Doubtless!”

“Why, then, inquire what we are to do? What would you say if, for instance, the most dangerous members of this Rennepont family were to come, before three months, and on their knees implore, as a favour, to enter into this company, of which they now have a horror, and from which Gabriel has to-day severed?”

“Such a conversion is impossible!” exclaimed the P. d’Aigrigny.

“Impossible! and what were you, then, fifteen years ago, sir?” said Rodin; “a worldly-minded, impious debauchee! and yet you came to us, and your property became ours. What! we have subdued princes, kings, and popes; we have absorbed, extinguished in our unity the most exalted understandings; we have controlled almost the two worlds; we have perpetuated ourselves vigorous, rich, and redoubtable, to this day, in spite of all hatreds and proscriptions; and shall we not get the better of one family which threatens us so vitally, and whose property, filched from our company, has become to us of paramount necessity? What! shall we not be skilful enough to obtain this result, without clumsy violence and crimes that compromise? Are you, then, so ignorant of the immense resources of annihilation, mutual and partial, which are offered by the play of the human passions skilfully combined, opposed, crossed, loosened, and over-excited? and then, when, perhaps, thanks to an all-potent auxiliary,” added Rodin, with a strange smile, “these passions may double their ardour and violence ——”

“What auxiliary?” asked Père d’Aigrigny, who, as well as the Princess de Saint-Dizier, experienced a sort of admiration, mingled with affright.

THE FIRST LAST AND THE LAST FIRST

"Yes!" continued Rodin, without replying to the R. P., "for this dread auxiliary, if it come to our aid, may bring with it overwhelming transformations, render cowardly the most daring, credulous the most impious, and fierce the most gentle!"

"But who is this auxiliary?" exclaimed the princess, oppressed with vague alarm; "this auxiliary, so powerful, so dread, what is it?"

"If it do arrive," resumed Rodin, as pale and impassive as ever, "the youngest, the most vigorous, will be at each moment in danger of death as imminent as the dying man at his last moment."

"But this auxiliary?" exclaimed the Père d'Aigrigny, more and more alarmed; for the more Rodin darkened the gloomy picture, the more cadaverous did his countenance become.

"In fact, this auxiliary may easily decimate the population, inclose in the shroud which it drags at its heels a whole accursed family: but it will be forced to respect the life of a great immutable body, which is never weakened by the death of its members, because its mind—the mind of the Society of Jesus—is imperishable!"

"But—but this auxiliary?"

"Well, this auxiliary," continued Rodin; "this auxiliary, which advances, advances by slow paces, and whose terrible advent is announced by fearful and widely spread presentiments ——"

"It is ——?"

"THE CHOLERA!!"

At this word, pronounced by Rodin in a harsh and piercing tone, the princess and Père d'Aigrigny turned pale and shuddered.

Rodin's look was gloomy and chilling, his appearance was corpse-like.

For some seconds the silence of the grave reigned in the salon. Rodin first broke it. Still impassive, he pointed with an imperious gesture to Père d'Aigrigny, and then to the table, at which some minutes before he, Rodin, was humbly sitting, and said in a harsh voice,—

"Write!"

The R. P. at first started with surprise, then remembering that from superior he had sunk to subaltern, he arose, bowed to Rodin, passed in front of him, seated himself at the table indicated, took up his pen and turning to Rodin, said,—

"I am ready."

Rodin dictated, and the père wrote as follows:—

"Through the mismanagement of the R. Père d'Aigrigny, the affair of the Rennepont inheritance has been to-day seriously compromised. The amount of the inheritance is two hundred and twelve millions. In spite of this check, we are of opinion that we can still formally undertake to prevent the Rennepont family from doing any injury to the company, and obtain for the said company the restitution of the two hundred and twelve millions, which legitimately belong to it,—only, we must have the most entire and full powers to act."

* * * * *

A quarter of an hour after this scene Rodin left the Hôtel de Saint-Dizier, brushing his old greasy hat against his sleeve, and taking it off to acknowledge, by a very low bow, the bow of the porter.

PART VII.

THE PROTECTOR.

CHAPTER XIII.

THE UNKNOWN.

THE following scene occurred the day after that on which the Père d'Aigrigny had been so rudely thrust from his pre-eminence by Rodin into that subaltern post which the socius had previously filled.

* * * * *

The Rue Clovis is in one of the most lone parts of the quarter of la Montagne-Sainte-Genève; and, at the time of this recital, the house numbered 4 in the street consisted of a principal corps de logis, traversed by a dark alley, which led to a small, dark court, at the bottom of which was a second building, in a most dilapidated condition.

The ground-floor of the façade was converted into a shop, half under ground, where were sold coals, wood in bundles, some vegetables, and milk.

Nine o'clock had struck, and the shopkeeper, named Mother Arsène, an old woman with a gentle but sickly complexion, wearing a gown of brown dimity, and a red cotton handkerchief round her head, was standing on the bottom step of the flight which led to her cave, and was finishing the display of her stock—that is, on one side of her door she stationed a tin milk-pail; and on the other some bundles of withered vegetables, and particularly cabbages, with faded yellow heads. At the bottom of the staircase, in the shadow of the cellar, might be seen the glare of the burning embers of her little stove.

The shop, which was close to the alley, served for a porter's lodge, and the fruitwoman was the portress.

At this moment a charming little creature came out of the house, and entered, light and gaily, into Mother Arsène's.

It was the young girl called Rose-Pompon, the intimate friend of the Queen-Bacchanal. Rose-Pompon, who was temporarily a widow, and whose bacchic, but respectful Cicisbeo, was, as we are aware, Nini-Moulin, that orthodox out-and-outer (chicard), who, when need was, transformed himself after his revels into Jacques Dumoulin the religious writer; passing thus easily from a wanton dance to ultra-montane polemics, from the "full-blown tulip" to a Catholic pamphlet.

Rose-Pompon had just left her bed, as appeared by the négligée of her early and whimsical toilette. For want, no doubt, of some other head-dress, she had placed jauntily on her lovely light brown hair, so silky and carefully adjusted, a bonnet de police, borrowed from her gay costume of débardeur. Nothing could be more attractive than her countenance at seventeen years of age, rosy, fresh, dimpled, and brilliantly lighted up by two animated and sparkling blue eyes. Rose-Pompon was wrapped so closely from her throat to her feet in a Scotch mantle, with its red and green checks somewhat faded, that it shewed an innate modesty; whilst her bare feet, so white that it was scarcely possible to tell if she had on stockings or not, were incased in small red morocco slippers, with silver buckles. It was easy to perceive that she had something in her hand, which her cloak concealed.

MOTHER ARSENE AND ROSE-POMPON.

"Good day, Mademoiselle Rose-Pompon," said Mother Arsène, with a kind air; "you are early to-day—didn't you dance last night?"

"Oh, do not talk to me about it, Mother Arsène; I had no heart for dancing, for poor dear Céphyse (the Queen-Bacchanal, sister of Mayeux,) was weeping all night, and would not be consoled, because her lover is in prison!"

"By the way," said the fruit-woman,—“by the way, mademoiselle, I must tell you something that concerns your friend Céphyse. I hope it will not offend you?”

"Offend me! Am I now offended?" said Rose-Pompon, shrugging her shoulders.

"Don't you think that when M. Philemon returns he will scold me?"

"Scold you! why?"

"Because of his lodging, which you occupy."

"Why now, Mother Arsène, did not Philemon, on the contrary, tell you that I was mistress of his two rooms in his absence as I was of himself?"

"It is not for you that I speak, mademoiselle, but your friend, Céphyse, whom you have also brought here to the lodging of M. Philemon."

"And where would she have gone but for me, my good Mother Arsène? After her lover had been arrested she did not dare return to her own rooms, because they owed all sorts of rent. So, seeing her trouble, I said to her, 'Come and lodge at Philemon's; when he comes back we will find some other place for you.'"

"Indeed, mademoiselle, if you are sure that M. Philemon will not be angry, why, it is all the same thing to me."

"Angry at what?—because we break his crockery? His crockery is so choice! Yesterday I broke the last cup, and only see what an odd thing I am compelled to make use of to come and fetch the milk in!"

And Rose-Pompon, laughing very heartily, thrust her pretty white arm forth from her cloak, and displayed to Mother Arsène one of those champagne glasses of colossal make which hold nearly a bottle.

"Ah!" said the astonished fruit-woman; "why, it looks like a crystal trumpet!"

"It is Philemon's state glass, with which he was presented when they made him a canotier-flambard (a species of aquatic odd-fellow, à la Française)."

"Really," said Mother Arsène, "I am quite ashamed that you should have to put your milk in such a thing."

"So am I; for if I should meet any one on the staircase, holding this glass in my hand like a wax candle, I should so laugh that I should break Philemon's last relic of domestic elegance, and then he would overwhelm me with his malediction."

"There is no fear of your meeting any one; the lodger on the first floor is gone out, and the second is a very late riser."

"Talking of lodgers," said Rose-Pompon, "haven't you a chamber to let on the second floor, at the bottom of the court? I was thinking of it for poor Céphyse when Philemon comes back."

"Yes, there is a miserable little closet under the tiles, over the two rooms tenanted by the old gentleman who is so very mysterious," said Mother Arsène.

"Yes, le Père Charlemagne; — don't you know any thing more about him?"

"No, mademoiselle; only that he came here this morning at a very early hour — day-break, and put back the outside shutters. 'Have you received a letter from any one, dear madame?' he said; he is always so very polite, the worthy gentleman. 'No, sir,' I replied. 'Well, well, then, don't disturb yourself, my dear madame; I shall call again.' And away he went."

"Doesn't he ever sleep in the house?"

"Never. Probably he lodges somewhere else, for he only comes here for a few hours in the day about every four or five days."

"And does he come alone?"

"Always alone."

"Are you sure he never brings in any young puss of a niece or cousin with him? for if so, Philemon would quit the lodgings," said Rose-Pompon, with an air of decorum that was very amusing.

"M. Charlemagne! a woman in his rooms! Ah, the poor man!" said the fruitress, lifting her hands to heaven; "if you did but see him with his greasy hat, his threadbare coat, his patched umbrella, and his stupid look,—why he looks more like a saint than any thing else!"

"Then, Mother Arsène, what can he come here for, alone for hours in that doghole at the bottom of the court, where one can hardly see clear at noonday?"

"That is what I want to know, mademoiselle. What can he do? It cannot be to amuse himself with his furniture, for all there is consists of a truckle-bed, a stove, a chair, and an old trunk."

"It is almost as brilliant a fit-out as Philemon's," said Rose-Pompon.

"Well, in spite of that, mademoiselle, he has as much fear of any one going in as if they were thieves and his furniture was made of massive gold. He has put on the door a safety-lock at his own expense, and never leaves the key with me; and then he always lights the fire in his stove himself, because he will not allow any person to enter his rooms."

"He is old, you say?"

"Yes, mademoiselle; between fifty and sixty."

"And ugly?"

"Only fancy two small, snaky-looking eyes, as if bored with a gimblet, in a face as pale as a corpse,—so pale, indeed, that his lips are white,—that is his face. As to his behaviour, the worthy old gentleman is so polite, and so often takes his hat off to make a low bow, that it is quite embarrassing."

"Still I must always ask," said Rose-Pompon, "what can he want all alone in two rooms? Well, if Céphyse takes the cabinet over him when Philemon comes back, we may have some amusement in finding out. How much do you ask for this cabinet?"

"Really, mademoiselle, it is in such a miserable condition that the proprietor will let it, I dare say, for from fifty to fifty-five francs a-year; for there is hardly space to put a stove in, and it is only lighted by a fanlight as large as a snuffbox."

"Poor Céphyse!" said Rose-Pompon, with a sigh, and shaking her head sorrowfully; "after having had so much pleasure, after having spent so much money with Jacques Rennepont, to live there, and be compelled to return to living by her needle! She must have courage, indeed, to do that!"

"Why, to speak the truth, it is a wide distance from that cabinet to the carriage and four horses in which Mademoiselle Céphyse came to fetch you the other day, with all those merry maskers who were so gay, particularly the stout man in the silver-paper helmet, with the long feather and the top-boots: what a droll fellow he was!"

"Yes, Nini-Moulin, who has not his equal for dancing the 'forbidden fruit.' You should just see him vis-à-vis with Céphyse, the Queen-Bacchanal. Poor laughing girl! poor riotous little dear! if she makes any disturbance now, it is in weeping."

"Ah, the follies of youth—the follies of youth!" said the fruitress.

"But, Mother Arsène, you were once young yourself, you know."

"Ma foi! it is as much as I was, if I tell the truth. I have always been pretty much as you see me now."

"And your lovers, Mother Arsène?"

"My lovers!—ah,—yes! Well, in the first place, I was ugly; and, then, I was too well taken care of."

"Your mother, then, kept a sharp look-out after you?"

"No, mademoiselle; but I was harnessed——"

"Harnessed! what do you mean?" said Rose-Pompon, quite astonished, and interrupting the fruit-woman.

"Yes, mademoiselle, harnessed to a water-cart with my brother. And so, you see, when we had tugged like two real horses for eight or ten hours a-day, I had not the heart to think of fun and frolic."

"Poor Mother Arsène! what a horrid trade!" said Rose-Pompon, with interest.

"In winter, particularly in the frosty weather, it was the hardest. I and my brother were obliged to wear shoes with long, rough nails, because it was so slippery."

"And to put a woman to such work! it makes my heart ache. And yet they are forbidden to harness dogs!"* added Rose-Pompon, very sensibly.

* There are in France very tender laws in favour of the canine race, whom it is forbidden to harness in any way.

"Indeed it is true," resumed Mother Arsène; "animals are sometimes more fortunate than human beings: but you see one must live. When the beast is tethered it must graze, but yet it was hard work. I got a complaint in my lungs by it—that was no fault of mine. The sort of collar with which I was harnessed when I pulled, pressed very hard on my chest; sometimes I could not breathe for it: so I left my harness and took a shop. Still I will say, that if I had had opportunity and kind usage, I might, perhaps, have been like a great many other young creatures, who begin by laughing, and end——"

"By the reverse! True, Mother Arsène; but all the world has not courage enough to take to harness in order to live prudently. Besides, one always finds an excuse, and says we should amuse ourselves when we are young and agreeable; besides, one is not always only seventeen: well, well, and then by and by comes either the end of the world, or, perhaps, one marries."

"Why now, mademoiselle, I should say the better way was to begin by that."

"Yes, but one is too ignorant—one does not know how to wheedle the men, or terrify them; as long as you are simple and credulous they laugh at you. Why, Mother Arsène, I could tell you what would startle all nature to hear, if I liked; but it is enough to have had one's troubles, without thinking of amusing one's self by recalling the remembrances of them."

"What, mademoiselle! have you, so young and gay, had your troubles?"

"I have indeed, Mother Arsène; and at fifteen and a-half I began to shed tears, which were not dried up at sixteen. That is trial enough, I hope."

"Were you deceived, mademoiselle?"

"Worse! as has been done to so many other poor girls, who, no more than myself, have desired to do wrong. My story is not a long one. My father and mother were country people near St. Valery, but poor—so poor that, out of five children which they had, they were obliged to send me, at eight years of age, to my aunt, who was a femme de ménage here in Paris. The good soul took me out of charity, and that was doing a great deal for her, for her earnings were very small. When I was eleven she sent me to work in one of the manufactories of the Faubourg Saint-Antoine. I do not wish to say any ill of the masters of these factories, but it is all the same to them if little boys and little girls are huddled together with young women and young men from eighteen to twenty years of age, who are also huddled together. So you may suppose that there are there, as there are every where, badly disposed persons, and they are not particular either in words or in actions; and, I ask you, what example is this for children who see and understand more than they pretend to do? So you see as one grows up one becomes accustomed to hear and see things every day, which at last do not shock you at all."

"That is too true, as you say, Mademoiselle Rose-Pompon. Poor dears! there's no one to take care of them,—no father, no mother,—they are at their work——"

"Yes, yes, Mother Arsène, and they soon begin to say of a young girl she is a this or she is a that; but if people only knew the reason of such things, perhaps they would more frequently pity instead of blame. Well, to return to myself, I really was at fifteen a very nice little girl. One day I had a complaint to make to the first clerk in the factory, so I went to his room, and he told me that he would set the matter right, and would even protect me, if I would listen to him; and then he tried to kiss me, and I struggled with him; then he said, 'You refuse me?—well, then, you sha'n't work here any longer: I dismiss you from the factory!'

"The wicked fellow!" said Mother Arsène.

"I returned home in tears, and poor aunt encouraged me not to give way, but to get a situation elsewhere. I tried, but it was impossible: the factories were crammed with work-people. A misfortune never comes alone—my aunt fell ill, and we had not a sou in the house. I took courage and returned to the factory, and again entreated the clerk, but in vain. 'So much the worse for you,' said he, 'to reject the good offer I made you; for if you had behaved properly, why by and by, very probably, I would have married you.' But I need not go on, Mother Arsène,—misery was on the one hand, I had no work, my aunt was sick, the clerk said perhaps he would marry me,—I did as others have done before me."

"And afterwards, when you asked him to marry you?"

"He laughed in my face, and at the end of six months left me. Then I wept all the tears in my body, so that none were left. I was ill with it,—but at last, like every one else, every body became consoled and I became consoled. At last I met with Philemon, and on him I have revenged myself with others. I am his tyrant!" added Rose-Pompon, with a tragic air. And as she said so, the cloud of sadness which had overshadowed her pretty face as she told her history to Mother Arsène passed away.

"It is evidently true!" said Mother Arsène, reflecting for a short time; "here is a poor girl been deceived by some one, without having any person to protect or defend her. Ah! how often it happens that we are not to blame for the wicked acts we may commit, for——"

"Well, I declare!" exclaimed Rose-Pompon, interrupting the fruitwoman, and gazing eagerly on the other side of the street, "is there is not Nini-Moulin! Isn't he early? I wonder what he can possibly want with me!" And, with these words, Rose-Pompon drew her mantle still more closely and carefully around her.

Jacques Dumoulin advanced, his hat stuck on one side, his nose more rubicund, and his eye twinkling more brightly than usual. He wore a loose paleto, which accurately defined the large proportions of his portly figure; while his two hands, one of which carried a thick stick placed gun fashion against his shoulder, were thrust into the vast pockets of his garment. At the moment of his approaching the portress, evidently with the design of asking her some question, he perceived Rose-Pompon.

"Holla!" cried he, "my ward up already?—that is all right! And behold me come to give you my blessing at the earliest blush of dawn."

So saying, suiting the action to the word, Nini-Moulin extended his arms, and advanced towards Rose-Pompon, who drew back from his proffered benedictions.

"How, my ungrateful child!" exclaimed the religious writer; "do you refuse my paternal embrace and morning blessing?"

"Thank you, I never accept paternal embraces from any one but Philemon! He wrote to me yesterday, and sent me a small box of raisins, two geese, a bottle of ratafia, and an eel!—rather a droll present, was it not? Well, I kept the ratafia, and changed all the rest away for two such loves of pigeons, whom I have put into Philemon's chamber, which will make a very pretty little dovecot. And, better still, my dear husband is coming back to me with seven hundred francs, given to him by his highly respectable family, for the purpose of learning the bass-viol, the cornet-à-piston, and the speaking-trumpet, in order to make him irresistible in society, and so enable him to find a wife with 'plenty of tin,' as you call it, my early friend."

"Then I'll tell you what we will do, my pet child; we will just employ the ratafia with our breakfast, for the purpose of wishing all health and happiness to Philemon and his respectable relations, and drinking to his speedy arrival, in company with his seven hundred francs."

As he spoke, Nini-Moulin slapped the pockets of his waistcoat, which straightforth returned a jingling metallic sound, then added,—

"I came to invite you to gild and embellish my life to-day, the next, and the day after—that is, if your heart——"

"Oh, if you are only proposing a sort of decent and fatherly visit, my heart will give me leave to accept your offer."

"Nothing can be more correct than my intentions. I will be your father, grandfather, great-grandfather—nay, a living portrait of every male relation you have ever had. Let us see! There will be a promenade, dinner, the theatre, fancy ball, and supper afterwards;—will that suit you?"

"Yes, upon condition that poor Céphyse goes with us. It will serve to divert her, poor thing!"

"With all my heart! Let Céphyse go."

"Why, what has happened to you, my fat friend? what piece of good luck befallen you? Has any body left you a fortune?"

"Better than that, rosiest of damask roses! I am appointed principal editor to a religious journal! Now, as my recent appointment will require me to become very sober and staid while in the precincts of the saintly concern, I have stipulated for a month's salary to be always paid in advance, with three days' free liberty to spend it in. On these conditions I have agreed to be a holy man for twenty-seven days out of the thirty, and to be as grave and stupid as the journal itself."

"You a journal—I mean, the conductor of one? What a droll one it must be, when its editor is seen dancing all manner of forbidden steps upon the tables of the various cafés!"

"Yes, it may seem a funny idea to you; but it will not appear any way droll to others I could mention. They are all the most pious saints who pay the piper. They do not consider the money, provided the journal is biting, tearing, burning, bruising, exterminating, assassinating. On my word, I have never been more violent and savage," added Nini, with a loud laugh. "I shall water the freshest gashes with my venom of the first growth, or with my gall of the most spar-r-r-r-r-kling effervescence!" And Nini-Moulin imitated the noise of a bottle of champagne when the cork bursts out, and Rose-Pompon laughed loudly.

"And what do you call your pious journal?" she asked.

"It is called 'The Love of One's Neighbour.'"

"A very right name."

"But it has another."

"Let's hear it."

"'The Love of One's Neighbour; or, the Exterminator of the Incredulous, the Indifferent, the Lukewarm, and others:' with this motto, 'Those who are not with us are against us.'"

"That is what Philemon says in his fights in the public-houses, when he lays about him."

"A proof the genius of the Eagle of Meaux is universal. I only reproach him with one thing, and that is his jealousy of Molière."

"Bah! an actor's jealousy!" said Rose-Pompon.

"Wicked Puss!" said Nini-Moulin, shaking his finger at her threateningly.

"Oh, is that the way you mean to exterminate Madame de Sainte-Colombe? She is rather lukewarm, eh? When's the wedding to be?"

"On the contrary, my journal is useful with her. Only think, chief editor! It is a superb position. The saints patronise me, thrust me forward, support me, bless me. I mean to lay hands on the Sainte-Colombe, and then a life—a life to death itself!"

At this moment a postman entered the shop, and handed a letter to the greengrocer, saying,—“For M. Charlemagne. Paid.”

"What!" said Rose-Pompon, "is it for the little mysterious old fellow with his odd ways? Does it come from a long way off?"

"I think from Italy—Rome," said Nini-Moulin, looking at the letter as the fruitwoman held it in her hand. "Who," said he, "is this wonderful little old man?"

"Only imagine, my bulky friend," said Rose-Pompon, "an old worthy, who has two rooms at the bottom of the courtyard. He never sleeps there, but comes to shut himself from time to time for hours, without allowing any person to go a-nigh him; and no one can make out what he does."

"He is a conspirator or a coiner," said Nini-Moulin, laughing.

"Poor, dear man!" said Mother Arsène; "where is his false money, then? He always pays me in honest sous for the morsel of bread and black radish which I give him for breakfast, whenever he does breakfast."

"And what is the name of this mysterious elderly?" asked Nini-Moulin.

"M. Charlemagne," said the fruitwoman. "But see, talk of the devil and you see his horns!"

"Where are his horns?"

"Look!—the little old man down there—coming by that house. He walks with his neck bent, and his umbrella under his arm."

"Monsieur Rodin!" exclaimed Nini-Moulin; and, receding quickly, he descended three steps down the ladder, that he might not be seen. Then he added, "And you say he is called——"

"M. Charlemagne. Do you know him?" inquired the green-grocer.

"What the devil can he be after here with a false name?" said Jacques Dumoulin, speaking to himself in a low voice.

"What, do you know him?" asked Rose-Pompon, in a tone of impatience. "You seem dumfounded!"

"And this gentleman has here two rooms, and makes mysterious visits?" said Jacques Dumoulin, more and more surprised.

"Yes!" replied Rose-Pompon. "You may see his windows from Philemon's dovecot."

"Quick, quick! Let us get down the alley that he may not meet me," said Dumoulin. And, without having been seen by Rodin, he glided from the shop into the alley, and from the alley went up the staircase which led to the apartment occupied by Rose-Pompon.

"Good-day, Monsieur Charlemagne!" said Mother Arsène to Rodin, who came to the threshold of her door. "To see you twice in one day is a pleasure, indeed; for you are so seldom here——"

"You are too kind, my dear madam," said Rodin, with a courteous salute.

And then he entered the fruitwoman's shop.

CHAPTER XIV.

THE RETREAT.

RODIN'S countenance, when he entered Mother Arsène's, breathed the most perfect simplicity; and, leaning his two hands on the handle of his umbrella, he said,—

"I am very sorry, my dear madam, to have awakened you so early this morning."

"Worthy sir, you come so seldom that I cannot have any thing to reproach you with."

"Why, my excellent madam, I live in the country, and can only come from time to time to my apartments here to attend to my little affairs."

"By the way, sir, the letter which you expected yesterday came this morning; it is a thick packet, and comes from a considerable distance. Here it is," said the fruitwoman, drawing the letter from her pocket; "there was no postage to pay."

"Thank you, my dear madam," said Rodin, taking the letter with assumed indifference, and putting it in the side-pocket of his greatcoat, which he buttoned up carefully.

"Are you going up-stairs, sir?"

"Yes, my dear lady."

"Then I will arrange your little provision," said Mother Arsène. "I suppose, worthy sir, it is to be as usual?"

"Yes, precisely so."

"I will have it all ready in a twinkling."

So saying, the greengrocer took an old basket, and having placed on it three or four turfs for burning, a little bundle of split wood, and some pieces of charcoal, she covered these combustibles with a cabbage leaf; then going to the innermost recess of her shop, she took from a bin a large round loaf, from which she cut a slice. After which she picked out, with the eye of a connoisseur, a magnificent black radish* from a bundle of these roots, cut it in two, and, making a hole in it, filled it with common coarse salt; put the two pieces together again, and placed them carefully beside the bread on the cabbage leaf, which separated the fuel from the eatables. Then taking from her stove some lighted charcoal, she put it in a wooden shoe filled with cinders, which she also placed in the basket. Going then to the last step of the staircase, Mother Arsène said to Rodin,—

"Here is your basket, sir."

"A thousand thanks, dear madam," replied Rodin; and thrusting his hand into his trousers' pocket, he took out eight sous, which he handed one by one to the fruitwoman, and said, as he took the basket from her, "By and by, when I come down again, I will return your basket as usual."

"Quite at your service, kind sir—quite at your service," said Mother Arsène.

Rodin put his umbrella under his left arm, took in his right hand the fruitress's basket, went into the dark alley, crossed a small court, and, with an active step, went up to the second story of a corps de logis, very much out of repair. When he had arrived there, taking a key out of his pocket, he opened an outer door, which he shut very carefully after him.

The first room of the two he occupied was completely unfurnished; and as to the second, it is impossible to imagine any retreat more squalid and poverty-struck.

A paper so rubbed, old, and torn, that its original shade was not to be traced, covered the walls; a rickety trucklebed, covered with a mean and mildewed counterpane, and a wretched mattress; a stool; a small table of worm-eaten wood; a stove of greyish earthenware, as crackled as the porcelain of Japan; an old trunk with a padlock, placed under the bed,—such was the furniture of this dilapidated doghole.

A narrow window, with dirty panes of glass, scarcely lighted this room, almost entirely deprived of air and light by the height of the building which looked on the street. Two old pocket-handkerchiefs, fastened together by pins, and which were movable at will by rings, which traversed a piece of packthread stretched from side to side of the window, served for curtains. The loose and broken planks, which shewed the plastering of the flooring, proved the utter carelessness of the lodger in this abode.

After having closed the door, Rodin threw his hat and umbrella on the trucklebed, placed the basket on the floor, and taking out the bread and black radish, deposited them on the plate. Then, kneeling before his stove, he piled up his combustibles therein, and lighted them, by blowing on the hot charcoal he had brought in the wooden shoe with a strong and powerful lung.

* This species of radish, which is of the size of a table turnip, but longer, is little known out of France, where it is popular with the poorer classes.

When, as the phrase goes, the stove began to draw, Rodin went and spread his two handkerchiefs, which were his curtains, on the packthread; and then, believing himself quite concealed from all eyes, he took from his pocket the letter which Mother Arsène had handed to him. As he did so, he drew out several papers and other things; one of these papers, soiled and rumpled, and folded into a small parcel, fell on the table and opened. It contained a Cross of the Legion of Honour, in silver, which time had blackened, and the red riband of the cross had almost lost its primitive colour.

At the sight of this cross, which he put in his pocket, together with the medal which Faringhea had stolen from Djalma, Rodin shrugged his shoulders and gave a contemptuous and sardonic smile. He then pulled out his large silver watch, and placed it on the table beside the letter from Rome.

He contemplated the letter with a singular mixture of mistrust and hope, fear and impatient curiosity. After a moment's reflection he was about to unseal the envelope, but threw it down suddenly on the table, as if, by a strange caprice, he desired to prolong for some moments the emotions of uncertainty as strong, as painful, and as exciting as the agonies of gaming.

Looking at his watch, Rodin resolved not to open the letter until the hand should mark half-past nine, of which it wanted seven minutes.

By one of those childish and odd beliefs in fatality, from which the greatest minds are not exempt, Rodin said to himself, "I am burning with desire to open this letter. If I do not open it until half-past nine o'clock, the news it conveys will be favourable!"

To employ these minutes, Rodin walked a few paces in his chamber, and then placed himself in admiring contemplation before two old yellow engravings, eaten up by age, and fastened to the wall by two rusty nails.

The first of these objects of art, the only ornaments with which Rodin had ever decorated this wretched place, was one of those coarsely designed pictures, coloured in red, yellow, green, and blue, which are sold at fairs. An Italian inscription announced that this engraving had been done at Rome.

It represented a woman covered with rags, carrying a wallet, and having on her knees a little child. A hideous fortune-teller was holding in her swarthy hands the hand of the little infant, and appeared to be divining its future fate, for these words were coming out of her mouth in large blue letters: "Sarà Papa" (He will be Pope).

The second of these objects of art, which seemed to inspire Rodin with profound meditation, was an excellent copperplate line-engraving, of which the careful finish, the drawing at once bold and accurate, contrasted strangely with the coarse daubing of the other print.

This rare and magnificent engraving, for which Rodin had paid six louis (an enormous luxury), represented a youth clothed in tatters. The ugliness of his features was compensated by the intelligent expression of his strongly marked physiognomy. Seated on a stone surrounded by a herd of swine which he was keeping, his pale face was seen as he leant on his elbow, and rested his chin in the palm of his hand.

The pensive and reflective posture of the young man, clothed like a mendicant, the power of his expansive forehead, the finesse of his penetrating look, the firmness of his clever mouth, seemed to announce an unconquerable resolution, united with a superior understanding and the most skilful address.

Over this figure the pontifical attributes encircled a medallion, in the centre of which was seen the head of an old man; the lines of his face, strongly marked and deeply incised, recalled in a striking manner, and in spite of their senility, the features of the young keeper of the herd.

This engraving had for its title, "THE YOUTH OF SIXTUS QUINTUS;" and the painted picture, "The Prediction." *

Looking at these engravings nearer and nearer, with an eye that grew more and more ardent and inquiring, as if it had asked for inspiration or hope from the pictures, Rodin had gone so close that, standing up as he did, and with his right hand behind his head, he was literally leaning with his elbow against the wall, whilst, thrusting his left hand into the pocket of his black trousers, he thus threw aside one of the skirts of his old olive greatcoat. For several minutes he maintained this meditative attitude.

* * * * *

Rodin, as we have said, came seldom to this retreat. By the rules of his order, he had up to this time lived with Père d'Aigrigny, whose surveillance was specially confided to him. No member of the congregation, especially in the subaltern position which Rodin had filled up to that time, was allowed to shut himself up at his own home, nor even possess a piece of furniture shutting with a key, so that nothing interfered with the exercise of a mutual and incessant espionage, one of the most powerful modes of action and servitude which was employed by the Company of Jesus.

In consequence of various combinations, which were personally important to him as well as others, which concerned the general interests of his order, Rodin had taken the lodging in the Rue Clovis unknown to any one.

It was from the depth of this unknown retreat that the socius corresponded directly with the most eminent and influential personages of the Sacred College.

It may, perhaps, be recollected, that at the beginning of this history, when Rodin wrote to Rome that the Père d'Aigrigny, having received the order to leave France without seeing his dying mother, had hesitated to set out—it may be remembered, we say, that Rodin had added, in the shape of a postscript at the bottom of the note, which announced to the General of the Order the hesitation of the Père d'Aigrigny† :—

* According to the tradition, it was predicted to the mother of Sixtus Quintus that he should be pope, and that he would, in his early youth, be a keeper of flocks and herds.

† Vide No. 7, p. 112.

"Assure the prince-cardinal he may fully rely on me, but that I expect, in his turn, he will serve me with equal zeal and activity."

This familiar way of corresponding with the most powerful dignitary of the order, the almost protecting tone of recommendation which Rodin addressed to a prince-cardinal, sufficiently proved that the socius, in spite of his apparent subalternship, was at this epoch considered as a man of great importance by many princes of the church, and other dignitaries, who wrote to him in Paris under his assumed name, and in cipher too, with every precaution and careful arrangement.

After several moments of meditation before the portrait of Sixtus Quintus, Rodin came slowly towards the table where he had placed the letter, which, by a sort of superstitious delay, he had deferred opening, in spite of his eager curiosity.

As it still wanted a few minutes before the hand marked half-past nine o'clock, Rodin, that no time might be lost, prepared his frugal breakfast very methodically. He placed on the table beside his ink-stand, garnished with pens, the bread and black radish; then, sitting down on his stool, and having the stove, as it were, between his legs, he drew from his pocket a horn-handled knife, the sharp blade of which was three quarters worn away; and alternately cutting a morsel of bread and a morsel of radish, he began his frugal repast with a keen appetite, fixing his eye on the hand of his watch.

When the fated moment arrived, Rodin broke open the envelope with a trembling hand. It contained two letters. The first seemed to give him but very indifferent satisfaction, for, after some moments, he shrugged his shoulders, rapped impatiently on the table with the handle of his knife, struck the letter disdainfully with the back of his dirty hand, and then perused the second missive, holding his bread in one hand, and with the other dipping his radish mechanically into the coarse salt spread on a corner of the table.

Suddenly he remained motionless. As he advanced in the perusal of his reading he seemed more and more interested, surprised, and struck.

Rising suddenly, he ran to the window, as if to assure himself by a second examination of the ciphers of the letter that he was not mistaken, so greatly had what he read taken him by surprise.

Rodin, no doubt, discovered that he had deciphered the letter precisely, for letting fall his arms, not with dismay, but with the surprise of a satisfaction as sudden as unexpected, he remained for some time with his head lowered, his look fixed and deep; the only mark of joy exhibited was by a sort of sonorous, rapid, and prolonged breathing.

Men as bold in their ambition as patient and determined in their subterranean sap, are astonished at the result, when that result incredibly exceeds and surpasses their sagacious and prudent forecast. Rodin was in this position — thanks to prodigies of cunning, address, and dissimulation; thanks to immense promises of corruption; thanks, indeed, to a singular admixture of admiration, alarm, and confidence, which his genius had inspired many influential persons with, Rodin learned from the pontifical government that, in a possible and probable result, he might, within a given time, pretend, with a chance of success, to a position which had, but too frequently, excited the fear, hatred, or envy of sovereigns, and which has been sometimes occupied by great and good men, by abominable wretches, or by persons sprung from the very dregs of society.

But, in order that Rodin might the more surely attain his aim, it was absolutely requisite for him to succeed in what he had engaged to undertake without violence, and solely by the play and action of the passions skilfully handled—that is to say, to assure to the Company of Jesus the possession of the property of the Rennepont family—a possession which had in it a double and immense consequence; for Rodin, according to his personal views, thought to make of his order (the chief of which was at his mercy) a footstool and a means of intimidation.

His first impression of surprise passed—an impression which, be it said, was but a kind of modesty of ambition, a mistrust of self, very common with men of really superior minds—Rodin contemplated more coolly and more logically the matter before him, and almost reproached himself for his surprise.

Yet, soon afterwards, by a whimsical contradiction, and again giving way to one of those puerile and absurd ideas before which man often bows, when he knows or thinks himself perfectly alone and hidden, Rodin rose suddenly, took the letter which had so agreeably astonished him, and actually opened it before the eyes of the picture of the young herdsman who became pope; and then shaking his head disdainfully and triumphantly, and darting at the portrait his reptile glance, he said between his teeth, whilst with his dirty finger he touched the pontifical emblems, “Well, brother!—and I, too, perchance!”

After this weak display Rodin resumed his seat; and, as if the good news he had received had sharpened his appetite, he placed the letter before him in order that he might read it again, and fixing his eyes on it, he began to gnaw his hard bread and black radish with a kind of furious joy, whilst he hummed an old air of the Litanies.

* * * * *

There was something strange, grand, and even fearful, in the opposite qualities of this immense ambition, already almost justified by events, and bounded, if we may so say, in such a wretched shelter.

Père d'Aigrigny, a man, if not very superior, at least had a real value, was a man of high rank by birth, very proud, well placed in the great world, had never dared even to have had the thought of pretending to that to which Rodin pretended at one leap. The only view of Père d'Aigrigny—and he thought that insolent—was to be one day elected general of his order—an order that embraced the whole world.

The difference of the ambitious daring in these two men is conceivable. When a man of first-rate mind, of a sound and active nature, concentrating all the force of his soul and body on one only thought, obstinately practises, as Rodin had done, chastity, frugality, and the voluntary renunciation of every indulgence of heart or senses, that man but seldom revolts against the sacred ordinances of his Creator but for the profit of some monster and absorbing passion, some infernal divinity, which, by an unholy compact, demands from him, in exchange for a redoubtable power, the annihilation of every noble inclination, every worthy attraction, every tender instinct, with which the Lord, in his eternal wisdom, in his inexhaustible munificence, has so paternally endowed his creature.

* * * * *

During the mute scene that we have just described, Rodin had not observed that the curtains of one of the windows situated on the third floor of the building which overlooked the corps de logis in which he was, had been somewhat drawn aside, and half disclosed the sly features of Rose-Pompon and the solemn visage of Nini-Moulin.

Consequently Rodin, in spite of his rampart of pocket-handkerchiefs, had not kept out the anxious and curious scrutiny of the two Coryphees of the "Storm-blown Tulip."

CHAPTER XV.

THE UNEXPECTED VISIT.

ALTHOUGH Rodin had experienced the utmost surprise on the perusal of the second letter from Rome, he would not allow his astonishment to betray itself in his reply. His frugal breakfast ended, he took a sheet of paper and wrote rapidly, and in cipher, the following note, in that abrupt and concise style which was habitual to him, when he was not obliged to restrain himself:—

"What you tell me does not surprise me—I had foreseen it all. Indecision and baseness always produce such results. It is not enough—heretic Russia cuts the throat of Catholic Poland—Rome blesses the murderers and curses the victims.*

"I would have it so.

"In return, Russia guarantees to Rome, through Austria, the bloody repression of the patriots of Romagna.

"I would still have it so.

"The bands of cut-throats of the good Cardinal Albani are not sufficiently numerous for the massacre of the impious Liberals—they are weary.

"That is not as I would have it.

"They must advance——"

* We read in the "Affairs of Rome," this admirable remark on Rome, from the pen of the most evangelical genius of our times:—

"So long as the struggle between Poland and her oppressors remained doubtful, the official Roman journal did not contain a word which could offend the people, victorious in so many struggles. But no sooner had it been subdued, scarcely had the atrocious vengeance of the czar began the lengthened punishment of the whole nation given over to the sword, to exile, and slavery, than the same journal could not find language insulting enough to heap on those whom Fortune had abandoned. We might, perhaps, be wrong to attribute this unworthy baseness to the direct interference of the pontifical government. It had laid down the law which Russia had enforced: it had said, WOULDST THOU LIVE? KEEP THOU THERE—CLOSE TO THE SCAFFOLD—AND AS THEY SHALL PASS DO THOU CURSE THE VICTIMS!"—LAMENNAIS, Affaires de Rome, p. 110.

At the moment when Rodin wrote these last words his attention was suddenly attracted by the clear and sweet voice of Rose-Pompon, who, knowing Béranger's ballads by heart, had opened Philemon's window, and was seated on the bar in front, and sang, with much expression and neatness, this couplet of the immortal song-writer :—

" 'Tis sin to say that God, who did create
And doth support us all, is angry ever ;
Bright wine, that with firm friendship well doth mate,
He gives—with love whose influence fadeth never.
Come, then, your aid, ye trio, lend,
To scare away dull mood—
And, glass in hand, let's all depend
On God who guards the good ! "

This song, commenced in such a divine spirit, contrasted so strangely with the cold cruelty of the lines written by Rodin, that he shuddered and bit his lips with rage when he heard this strain of the great and truly Christian poet, who had hit such hard blows at the evil church.

Rodin waited a few moments in fierce impatience, believing that the voice would continue ; but Rose-Pompon was silent, or, at least, only hummed, and then passed into another air, that of the " Good Pope," which she sang without the words.

Rodin, not daring to look out and see who was this impertinent singer, shrugged his shoulders, resumed his pen, and continued,—

" Another thing : it has become necessary to rouse up the independents in all countries, to excite the philosophising mania of Europe, to make Liberalism lash itself into a foam, to rouse against Rome all that is vociferous against her. To that end, proclaim in the face of the world the three following propositions :—

" 1st. It is abominable to maintain that we can acquire salvation, in any profession of faith, if our lives are pure.

" 2d. It is hateful and absurd to grant the people liberty of conscience.

" 3d. *There cannot be too much horror excited against the liberty of the press.**

* We find the following passages in the " Encyclical Letter " addressed by the pope to all the bishops in France in 1852, desiring that they and their flocks should conform to these instructions, as that they were in direct opposition to the laws of the land and the rights of citizens.

Need we say that M. de Lamennais protested, with all the power of his genius and great heart, against such odious maxims as those which we subjoin in all their ultramontane candour ?—

" We now arrive," says the holy father, " at another cause, with which we groan to see the church at this time afflicted ; that is, that indifferentism, or perverse opinion, which is spreading on all sides, through the wiles of the wicked, and according to which ETERNAL SALVATION MAY BE ACQUIRED BY ANY PROFESSION OF FAITH, PROVIDED THE LIVES BE RIGHT AND HONEST. It will not be difficult for you, in a matter so clear and evident, to reject an error so fatal to the people confided to your care."

Is not this clear enough ? advice to us who are confided to the cares of pastors ! This is not all. There is an Italian monk, the ultramontane chief of our bishops, who cancels, with a scratch of his pen, one of our most sacred rights—a right which has cost the country torrents of blood, shed in religious wars.

" From this infected source of indifferentism," continues the holy father, " flows the absurd and erroneous maxim—or, rather, this insane idea—that we must assure

"We must induce the weak man to declare these propositions strictly orthodox in every particular—to boast their good effect on despotic governments, on true Catholics, on the muzzlers of the people. He will be taken in the snare. The propositions regularly enumerated, the tempest will burst forth. A general rising against Rome—a wide-spreading schism—the Sacred College divided into three parties—one approving, the other blaming, and the third trembling. The weak man, still more alarmed than he is at this moment at allowing Poland to be massacred, will recoil before the clamours, reproaches, threats, and violent ruptures he himself has created.

"That suits me admirably.

"Then for one good P. V. to shake the conscience of the weak man—to disturb his mind—to affright his soul! To sum up: overwhelm him with disgust—divide his councils—isolate him—alarm him—redouble the ferocious ardour of the good Albani—rouse the appetite of the Sanfedists*—hand over the Liberals to their tender appetites—pillage, violation, massacre, as at Cesena—a real flowing tide of Carbonari blood! The weak man will have the after-gulp of it—so many murders in his name! He will recoil—he will recoil!—each day will accumulate his remorse—each night his terror—each moment his anguish! And the abdication which he threatens at this moment will come at last, perchance too soon—that is the only danger at present, and you must look to it!

"In case of abdication, I am down in the list of the Grande Pénitencerie. Instead of confiding to a general the control of our order, the best militia of the holy seat, I myself shall contest it. Henceforth that militia will give me no uneasiness; for instance, the Janissaries and the Pretorean guards were always troublesome to authority—why? because they were able to organise themselves as the defenders of a power beyond power itself: hence their means of intimidation.

and guarantee to each and all the LIBERTY OF CONSCIENCE. We prepare the way for this pernicious error by the full and unlimited liberty of opinion, which spreads far and wide, to the misfortune of religious and civil society."

It is plain that the holy father orders his bishops to inspire their flocks with horror at one of the fundamental laws of society. Let us conclude our extracts by a sample of the said holy father, not less violent nor less conclusive against the dragon of the press:—

"Then we have that dreadful liberty, which can never be held in too great horror, THE LIBERTY FOR A BOOKSELLER TO PUBLISH ANY WRITINGS WHATSOEVER; a liberty which some dare to request, and extend with as much publicity as ardour."

—Encyclical Letter of Pope Gregory X. (the present pope) to the Bishops of France.

* Pope Gregory XVI. had scarcely mounted the pontifical throne when he learnt of the revolt of Bologna. His first movement was to appeal to the Austrians, and excite the Sanfedists. Cardinal Albani beat the Liberals at Cesena, his troops pillaged the churches, sacked the city, violated the women. At Forlì the bands committed assassinations with the utmost coolness. In 1832 the Sanfedists shewed themselves in open day, with medals of the effigies of the Duke de Modena and the holy father, letters patent in the name of the apostolic congregation, privileges, and indulgences. The Sanfedists took literally the following oath:—I swear to elevate the throne and the altar on the bones of the infamous Liberals, and to exterminate them, without pity for the cries of children or the tears of old men and women. The disorders committed by these ruffians surpassed all bounds; the court of Rome regularised the anarchy, and organised the Sanfedists, or volunteer corps, to which they granted new privileges.—La Revolution et les Revolutionnaires en Italie: Revue des Deux Mondes, 15th Nov. 1844.

“Clement XIV.?—a fool. To destroy, abolish our order, was an absurd fault. Defend it—establish its innocence—declare himself its general—this is what he should have done. The order, thenceforward at his mercy, would have consented to every thing. He should have absorbed us—enfeoffed us to the holy chair—which had then no reason to fear our services! Clement XIV. died of the cholic. Verbum sap.! If the case should so result, I shall not die that death.”

Again Rose-Pompon's voice was heard clear and vibrating. Rodin jumped from his chair in anger, but soon as he heard the following couplet, which he did not know (he had not his Béranger, as had Philemon's widow), the Jesuit, accessible to certain fancies whimsically superstitious, remained stupified and almost frightened at the singular coincidence. It is the Good Pope of Béranger who says:—

“And what are kings but fools at best,
Or robbers puffed with pride?
Who clothe their crimes in ermine vest,
And—die like all beside!
I can absolve them all for gold,
Or change their sceptre to a staff—
Brave boys, laugh—
Laugh and sing—
Dance and spring—
Whilst I dart the thunder bold!
Heaven's lightning's mine—
I am divine!”

Rodin half rose from his chair with outstretched neck, and his eye fixed, whilst Rose-Pompon, fluttering like a bee from flower to flower of her collection of songs, now began to sing the delightful song of Colebri.

Hearing no more the Jesuit resumed his seat in a sort of amazement, but, after a few moments' reflection, his face suddenly brightened—he perceived a happy presage in this singular incident.

He resumed his pen, and his first words smacked, as it were, of his strange trust in fatality:—

“I was never more confident of success than at this moment,—another reason why nothing should be neglected. Every presentiment should have increase of zeal. Another thought has just occurred to me: we shall act here in concert. I have established an ultra-Catholic journal, ‘The Love of One's Neighbour;’ by its ultra-montane, tyrannous, and anti-freedom fury, it will be believed to be the organ of Rome. I shall give all possible credibility to these reports. Fresh fuel for the flames.

“All this goes as I would have it.

“I shall open the question of the right of instruction,—the Liberals of the first class will support us. Asses that they are! they will admit to this common right, when our privileges, immunities, influence in confessional, our obedience to Rome, put us without the pale of the common right, through the very advantages that we enjoy. Double, triple asses! they think us disarmed, because they are so themselves as against us.

"Burning questions—irritating disputes,—fresh disgust for the weak man! Every rivulet swells the torrent.

"That all works as I would have it.

"To sum up in two words,—the end is abdication! the means, eternal worry—incessant torture! The Rennepont inheritance will pay for the election—price fixed—goods sold!"

Rodin ceased suddenly to write, thinking he heard some noise at the door of the room which opened on the staircase; he listened, held his breath, all was still again, and, thinking he was mistaken, he resumed his pen:—

"I take upon myself the Rennepont affair, that unique pivot of our temporal combinations: it must be renewed on a different system—we must now play on different interests, the springs of the passions, instead of the stupid, senseless blows of the club stricken by P. d'Aigrigny, who has nearly ruined the entire affair. Still he has yet many useful points at command—the world, powers of persuasion, a quick and penetrating glance; but then only one gamut, and not yet great enough to know how to make himself little. From his mediocrity I shall derive due advantages,—there are bits of utility still left. I have used at the precise moment the power plenipotentiary of the R. P. G. I shall tell Père d'Aigrigny, if I see fit, the secret engagements between myself and the general; up to this time I have let him work for this inheritance, whose destination you know: good ideas, but untimely—the same end by another route.

"The information, wrong—there are more than two hundred millions; the period having elapsed, what was in doubt is now certain, and we have a wide field before us.

"The Rennepont affair is at this moment mine in a twofold sense. Before three months have elapsed these two hundred millions shall be ours, by the free consent of the heirs: this must be. For if this fails, the temporal grasp escapes me; my chances are diminished by one half. I have asked for full powers,—time presses, and I shall act as if I had them. Information is necessary for my plans—I expect it from you. I must have it: you understand me? The high influence of your brother at the court of Vienna must serve you in this. I wish to have the most precise details as to the real position of the Duke de Reichstadt at this moment, the real Napoleon II. of the imperial party. Can we—yes or no—have, through your brother, a secret correspondence with the prince unknown to those who are about him?

"Advise me on this speedily, for it is urgent. This note goes to-day, I shall complete it to-morrow. It will reach you as usual by the little shopkeeper."

At the moment when Rodin had placed this letter under a double cover and sealed it, he thought he again heard a noise outside the door.

He listened.

After a few moments' silence, several raps at his door were plainly heard in the room.

Rodin started: it was the first time that any person had ever knocked at the door during the time he had tenanted the rooms.

THE UNEXPECTED VISIT.

Putting hastily into his great-coat-pocket the letter he had just written, the Jesuit opened the old trunk lid under his trucklebed, took thence a packet of papers wrapped in a ragged pocket-handkerchief, placed in the parcel the two letters in cipher which he had just received, and carefully locked the trunk.

The knocking continued outside with increased impatience.

Rodin took the greengrocer's basket in his hand, his umbrella under his arm, and, much disturbed, he went to see who this unpleasant visitor could be.

He opened the door, and found himself face to face with Rose-Pompon, the troublesome singer, who, making him a low and graceful courtesy, said, with an air of the greatest simplicity in the world,—

“Monsieur Rodin, if you please?”

CHAPTER XVI.

A FRIENDLY SERVICE.

RODIN, however great his surprise and uneasiness at so unexpected a visitor, betrayed no outward mark of perturbation; on the contrary, he first carefully closed the door after him, and then casting a scrutinising glance on the features of the very pretty creature who stood before him, he contented himself with inquiring, in a calm and encouraging tone,—

“Whom did you wish to see, my good girl?”

“M. Rodin, sir, if you please!” answered Rose-Pompon, opening her large, saucy-looking blue eyes their utmost width, and looking full in the face of the person she addressed.

“Ah!” replied Rodin, preparing to descend the stairs, “no such person lives here—I don’t know the name—you had better inquire higher up, or, perhaps, lower down—I really can’t assist you.”

“Well!” exclaimed Rose-Pompon, shrugging her shoulders, and bursting into a merry laugh; “that’s what I call a very pretty joke for so staid and respectable an individual as you to try and play off upon a poor girl like me! just as if every one didn’t know well enough that your name is Rodin.”

“I beg your pardon,” said the socius; “Charlemagne is my name—Charlemagne, at your service!—if, indeed, there is any thing I can do for you. But I am too old to expect that such a pretty girl can require the services of a person like me.”

“Stuff and nonsense!” responded Rose-Pompon, in a tone of mingled irony and command; “don’t talk so to me! What! I suppose we have got our little private reasons for playing at hide-and-seek here, and changing our name to prevent the good woman at home from hearing of our naughty tricks? Oh! you are a sly old fellow, you are—but you see I’ve found you out!”

“Come, come! my good girl,” said the socius, smiling a smile of paternal blandness, "you seem, at any rate, to know my character, if you are mistaken in my name. I am indeed an old man, with a young heart, and nothing delights me more than to witness the buoyant happiness of young people. Ah, I love the young! it rejoices me to see their light and joyous natures revelling in the delights of the present, without reflecting upon the dark hour which is to come. But let me pass, my dear! amuse yourself as much as you like at my expense, but pray permit me to go down the stairs, for my time is very precious;" and again Rodin essayed to descend the staircase.

"Stay, M. Rodin!" cried Rose-Pompon, in deep and solemn voice; "I can't let you go yet. I have something very particular indeed to communicate to you, and after that I want to consult you upon a small love affair."

"Why, you little madcap, have you got nobody at home you can tease, that you are obliged to come and play your pranks off upon me?"

"Why, Lord bless you, M. Rodin!" answered Rose-Pompon, purposely pronouncing the name with considerable emphasis; "this is my home—I live here!"

"You do? only imagine my being ignorant of possessing so pretty a neighbour!"

"Well, I declare I wonder at that! Why, M. Rodin, I have been lodging here these six months."

"Have you, really? Whereabouts?"

"On the third floor—just opposite your window, M. Rodin."

"And I suppose you are the charming songstress I heard warbling so divinely while I was taking my breakfast?"

"The very same, Monsieur Rodin."

"Upon my word you afforded me a great treat."

"I'm sure it's very polite of you to say so, M. Rodin."

"And of course you are residing here in the bosom of your respectable family?"

"Of course I am, M. Rodin!" answered Rose-Pompon, casting down her eyes, and speaking in a tone of candid naïveté; "I live with my grandfather Philemon and my grandmother Bacchanal, who is just a queen neither more nor less."

Rodin had been up to the present moment in a state of undefinable apprehension and alarm, from his ignorance of the manner in which Rose-Pompon had contrived to possess herself of his real name; but when he heard her allude to the Queen-Bacchanal, and still more learned that the person so designated inhabited the same house with himself, he found, in the pleasing prospect all this held out, a very agreeable recompense for all he had been made to suffer through the joke played off by his unknown tormentor, and the unexpected appearance of Rose-Pompon. It was, in fact, highly essential to the plans of Rodin to discover the abode of the Queen-Bacchanal, the mistress of Couche-tout-Nu, and the sister of La Mayeux; the latter having, since her conversation with the superior of the convent, and subsequent interview with Mademoiselle de Cardoville, been signalled as a dangerous and suspected person.

And more than this, Rodin, after what he had already learned, hoped, by a little skilful management, to draw from the unsuspecting

Rose-Pompon the name of the person by whose direction she had sought to surprise his incognito, and from whom she had heard that M. Charlemagne and M. Rodin were one and the same individual.

Scarcely then had the young girl uttered the name of the Queen-Bacchanal than, with a sudden clasp of the hands, Rodin assumed an expression of mingled surprise and intense interest.

"My good girl," exclaimed he, "let me beg of you to leave off jesting, and tell me truly whether the person you style the Queen-Bacchanal is sister to a deformed young sempstress."

"Yes, to be sure I do!" answered Rose-Pompon, on her side exhibiting the most unfeigned astonishment; "people call her so, but her real name is Céphyse Soliveau, and she is my own most particular friend."

"Ah!" said Rodin, thoughtfully; "she is your friend, is she?"

"Yes, sir! I told you she was the friend I love best in the world."

"Oh, you love her extremely, do you?"

"That I do! quite as much as if she were my own sister. Poor girl! I do all I can for her, but that is not much. But how, in the name of wonder, comes a person of your age and appearance to know any thing about the Queen-Bacchanal? Ha! now you see I was right! Yes, yes! it is very easy to guess why you hide yourself here under a false name!"

"My good girl," said Rodin, sadly, "I cannot joke further on a subject so painful to me." And the tone in which he spoke was so natural, and yet so mournful, that the kind heart of Rose-Pompon reproached her for having thus pained him; and she asked, in a more subdued manner,—

"But how do you chance to be acquainted with Céphyse?"

"I know nothing about her, my dear; but I am aware she is in some manner associated with a fine young fellow, to whom I am most tenderly attached."

"Do you mean Jacques Rennepont?"

"Otherwise called Couche-tout-Nu, who at this moment," said Rodin, heaving a piteous sigh, "is in prison for debt; I saw him there myself last night."

"You did!" exclaimed Rose-Pompon, clapping her hands with considerable energy; "why, good gracious me, how very odd! But come, come along with me up to Philemon's apartments, and give poor Céphyse all the news you can about Jacques, for she is dreadfully low-spirited about him."

"My good girl, I wish it were in my power to give her any favourable accounts of this young man, whom I love, spite of his follies and many faults. Alas!" added Rodin, assuming an air of ingenuous benevolence; "which of us has not his faults and errors to lament and amend?"

"I believe you!" said Rose-Pompon, swaying herself from side to side, as if still imagining she wore her masquerade costume of the débardeur.

"I will go still farther," said Rodin, "and confess 'tis for those very follies I principally love Jacques; "for after all, say what you will, the finest hearts, the most generous natures, are usually found among those who most lavishly spend their gold, more for the amusement of others than for their own particular gratification."

"Well, I declare!" cried Rose-Pompon, enchanted with a code of philosophy that so entirely resembled her own. "I declare you are the very nicest elderly gentleman I ever heard speak, though you don't exactly look so. But why won't you come and see poor Céphyse, and tell her all about Jacques?"

"What is the good of my telling her what she already knows, namely, that Jacques is in prison? No! what I should like to do would be to extricate the poor fellow from his present unfortunate situation."

"Oh, sir!" cried Rose-Pompon, "only do that—only just get poor Jacques out of prison, and see how Cephyse and I will hug you for it!"

"It would be throwing your kindness away, my little madcap!" said Rodin, smiling; "but of this be assured, I need no offer of reward to induce me to perform the little it is in my poor power to achieve."

"But you hope and expect to release Jacques from that vile prison, don't you, sir?"

Rodin shook his head, and replied, with an air of vexation and regret,—

"I did certainly entertain that hope—but, unfortunately, things are now completely altered."

"Oh, why are they?" asked Rose-Pompon, with pained surprise.

"That little joke you played off just now, in calling me Rodin instead of Charlemagne, must have seemed to you very amusing, no doubt, my dear. Of course I know it did not originate with you; you merely spoke the words dictated to you by another person, who, no doubt, said to you, 'Go and have a bit of fun with that old gentleman, call him M. Rodin, it will be quite conical to see how astonished he will look.'"

"That's quite true!" replied Rose-Pompon. "I'm sure I never should have thought of such a thing of my own accord; besides, how should I have known that your name was Rodin unless somebody had told me?"

"Well, then, the consequence is that this unknown joker, be he who he may, has, without intending it, done the most serious injury to poor Jacques Rennepont."

"Oh, good gracious!" exclaimed Rose Pompon, quite overcome with grief, and bitterly regretting the part she had played at the instigation of Nini-Moulin; "is it possible that all this mischief comes of my having called you Rodin instead of Charlemagne?" Then receiving no answer to her inquiry, she added, "But do tell me, sir, if you please, what your name can possibly have to do with any service you intended to render Jacques?"

"That, my dear, I am not at liberty to tell you. All I can say is I am truly sorry for poor Jacques, and regret it has been put out of my power to help him. But now let me pass, if you please, for my time presses."

"Oh, pray don't go yet, sir!" cried Rose-Pompon. "Do stay a little longer, and tell me, if I give up the name of the person who set me on to call you M. Rodin, will you then interest yourself in poor Jacques's favour?"

"My good girl, I desire to find out nobody's secrets. It is very clear you have been merely the tool and plaything of another in this little affair, and this other may be some person whose anger it might be highly dangerous to provoke; and I can assure you I have no desire to make enemies. No, indeed! I am a peaceable old man, and desire to live on good terms with every one."

Rose-Pompon neither understood nor cared for the fears expressed by Rodin, whose expectations were fully realised by her exclaiming, after a short pause, "I can't quite comprehend what you are afraid of, sir; but, for my own part, I am so miserable to think I should have been the cause of any injury to Jacques, that I will tell you, of my own free-will, all about it. Perhaps, by speaking the exact truth, I may help Jacques after all?"

"Truth is a jewel," replied Rodin, sententiously, "and frequently clears up many a dark page in daily life."

"And besides," continued Rose-Pompon, "if any body has done wrong, it is Nini-Moulin. Why should he set me on to say things that would hurt the lover of poor, dear Céphyse? I'll tell you exactly how it was, sir. A person named Nini-Moulin, who is very fond of a joke, saw you in the street, and inquired of the portress who you were. She told him, 'M. Charlemagne.' 'No, no!' said he to me; 'his right name is Rodin. Let us have a lark! Go up to him and address him as M. Rodin; you will see what a start you will give him!' He made me promise on no account to say he had any thing to do with it. But since I find that by following his orders I have done harm to poor Jacques, I won't hold my tongue any longer."

At the name of Nini-Moulin, an involuntary expression of surprise escaped Rodin. As the mere pamphleteer, the writer to whose care had been committed the editorship of the journal entitled "The Love of One's Neighbour," Nini-Moulin was not personally an object to be in any way dreaded. But then, with his loquacious propensity to communicate all he knew, which generally came on in proportion to the wine he drank, Nini might be troublesome in many ways, more especially during the frequent visits Rodin proposed paying to the house, in order to carry out his plans upon Couche-tout-Nu through the medium of the Queen-Bacchanal. This possible inconvenience the socius determined to guard against.

"So then, it seems, my good girl," said he, "that it is to a M. Desmoulins I am indebted for the little frolic you have just alluded to?"

"No, not Desmoulins," answered Rose-Pompon, "but Dumoulin. He writes in the newspapers, and does religious books—and all that; and defends all sorts of priests and bigots for the sake of the money he gets for it. For, certainly, if Nini-Moulin be a saint, his patrons must be St. Soiffard and St. Chicard,* as he says himself."

"Oh, what your witty friend is mirthful and facetious about himself as well as others, is he?"

* The above names are not translatable, further than by saying they resemble in meaning the words Saint Lushington and Saint Larker.

"Oh, he is a very good sort of fellow, I can assure you!"

"Stop a bit — stop a bit," cried Rodin, as if trying to collect his ideas; "is he not a man of about thirty-six years of age — stout — fresh-coloured?"

"Yes, I believe you," cried Rose-Pompon; "with a complexion the very colour of red wine, with a nose pimpled all over just like a mulberry-tree!"

"The very same," said Rodin. "I know him well; and a very good, worthy sort of person he is! Ah, then, the joke you had at my expense is of no consequence, since it was merely a friendly one on the part of M. Dumoulin, who is a very excellent man, excepting, perhaps, being a little too fond of pleasure."

"Then, sir, you will still try to help poor Jacques — will you not, spite of this stupid jest of Nini-Moulin's?"

"I will do my best, I promise you."

"And I suppose, sir, I had better not let Nini-Moulin know of my telling you it was he set me on to call you M. Rodin?"

"Why not, my dear? Let me advise you at all times to speak the truth fearlessly and candidly."

"Oh, but then Nini was so very particular that I should on no account mention his name."

"But your motive in divulging it was so good, that I can see no objection to your informing him of it. However, my dear, it is your affair and not mine; therefore, do precisely as you please in the matter."

"And may I mention to Céphyse your kind intentions towards Jacques?"

"Candour, my dear girl, never hurts. No harm can ever arise from speaking of things as they really are."

"Poor Céphyse! won't she be glad?" said Rose, energetically; "and I'm sure she wanted something to revive her just now!"

"Only remember not to exaggerate too much the little I have promised; and remember, I pledge myself to nothing. I do not promise actually to release Jacques from prison — all I say is, I will try. However, one thing you may safely engage in my name — for I doubt not but since poor Jacques's imprisonment your friend is considerably inconvenienced for means to live, and ——"

"Alas, monsieur, you are quite right!"

"Well, then, all I promise is a trifling assistance, which your friend shall receive in the course of the day, in order that she may have the means of living honestly; and if she behaves virtuously and correctly — why then, I say, by and by we shall see what can be done."

"Ah, sir, you little know how opportunely you have come to the relief of poor Céphyse — you will be the very saving of her! Well, whether your name be Rodin, Charlemagne, or any thing else, all I can say is, you are a dear, respectable old ——"

"Come, come, my dear," said Rodin, interrupting her, "do not allow your gratitude to carry you away. Call me nothing more than a well-meaning old man, my good girl; more than that would far exceed my merits. But only see now how one thing leads to another! Who would have thought when, just now, I confess I felt annoyed at your knocking at the door, that the circumstance would have introduced me at once to a pretty neighbour and the means of performing a good action? Now, go and comfort your friend. This evening shall bring her not only pecuniary aid, but—God willing!—consolation and hope for the future. There are still some left in this world who can pity and feel for the distresses of others.”

“Ah, sir, you are an ample proof of that!”

“Nay, the thing is simple and natural enough. What further business or enjoyment have the aged on earth except to promote the happiness of the young?”

All this was uttered by Rodin in a tone of such exquisite benevolence, that poor Rose-Pompon could hold out no longer. Her eyes filled with tears, and she exclaimed in energetic words,—

“Ah, sir, Céphyse and I are only two poor girls—not so good as many are, unfortunately; but, for all that, our hearts are not without right and proper feelings. And if you should ever be ill, or in any way afflicted, only send for us, and we will watch and tend you like affectionate sisters. That is all we have to offer in return for your great goodness; but, when Philemon returns, I will make him go through fire and water to serve you—that I promise you; and so Céphyse will engage for Jacques, I am sure, that he shall serve you by night or by day.”

“That makes good what I said to you, my dear, a little while ago—giddy-headed people often have warm, generous hearts. Now, then, farewell, till we meet again!”

So saying, Rodin taking up the basket he had laid down on the staircase beside his umbrella, prepared to descend the stairs.

“Oh, pray let me carry your basket for you!” said Rose-Pompon, taking it from the hands of Rodin, spite of all his attempts to detain it. “Yes, give it to me—you will walk better without it; and just take hold of my arm! The staircase is so dark, you might slip down and hurt yourself.”

“Thank you, my dear! I will accept your kind offer; for I am not very strong.”

And so, paternally holding the right arm of Rose-Pompon, while she carried his basket in her left hand, Rodin descended the staircase, and crossed the courtyard.

“Look!” said Rose-Pompon, all of a sudden to Rodin; “do you see that great, broad face stuck against the window of the room on the third floor?—There, that is Nini-Moulin! Do you know him? Is it the person you thought?”

“The same!” said Rodin, taking off his hat, and making a very formal and respectful bow to Jacques Dumoulin, who, thoroughly disconcerted, abruptly withdrew from the window.

“Poor fellow! I am afraid he is apprehensive he has offended me with his little joke,” said Rodin, smilingly; “but he is wrong—very wrong!”

The latter words were accompanied with a sinister contraction of the lips, which passed unobserved by Rose-Pompon.

“Now then, my good girl,” said he, as together they entered the little alley, “I have no longer need of your assistance; so make haste back to your friend, and carry her the good news you have got for her.”

"Yes, yes — that I will; for I am all impatience to tell her what a dear old man you are!" So saying, Rose-Pompon darted off up the staircase.

"Hallo! hallo!" cried Rodin; "what a wild little thing it is! She is running off with my basket!"

"O dear, so I am! I'm sure I beg your pardon, sir! Poor, dear Céphyse! — won't she be half mad with joy? Good-bye, sir — good-bye!" And almost ere the words were uttered, the light buoyant figure of Rose-Pompon had disappeared amid the intricacies of the staircase, which she climbed with an eager, bounding step.

Rodin then emerged from the alley.

"Here is your basket, my good madam," said he, as he stood on the threshold of Mother Arsène's shop. "I am extremely obliged to you — infinitely indebted for your great kindness!"

"Oh, pray sir, do not name such a trifle! I'm sure I shall always be delighted to serve you! I hope the radish turned out good?"

"Most excellent, my good madam. Succulent and juicy as could be!"

"Ah, I thought it would! I'm very glad to hear it! Shall we see you again soon, sir?"

"I hope so. Can you direct me to a post-office near here?"

"Yes, sir; there is one at the bottom of the street, if you turn to the right. The third house is a grocer's shop — there you will find a post-office."

"A thousand thanks!"

"I'll be bound, now," said Mother Arsène, probably moved to gaiety by her contact with Rose-Pompon and Nini-Moulin, "that you have got a love-letter you want to dispatch to the girl of your heart?"

"Ha! ha! ha!" said Rodin, jerking himself into a sort of convulsive laugh; "this good lady will be the death of me." Then, all at once resuming his accustomed seriousness of manner, he made a profound bow to the fruitwoman, saying, "Your most obedient, humble servant!"

With these words he passed into the street.

* * * * *

We shall now conduct our readers to the mansion of Doctor Baleinier, where Mademoiselle de Cardoville was still confined.

CHAPTER XVII.

INSIDIOUS COUNSELS.

ADRIENNE DE CARDOVILLE had been confined in the house of Dr. Baleinier more strictly than ever since the united nocturnal attempt of Agricola and Dagobert; in which the soldier, though severely wounded, had contrived, thanks to the intrepidity of Agricola aided by the heroic Kill-joy, to regain the little door of the convent-garden, and escape by the outer boulevard, with the young smith.

Four o'clock had struck, and Adrienne, since the preceding day, had been conducted into a chamber in the second story of the Maison de Santé, where a grated window, protected by an outside screen, only allowed a feeble light to penetrate the apartment.

The young lady, since her conversation with La Mayeux, expected to be delivered very speedily, through the intervention of her friends; but she experienced very great uneasiness with respect to Agricola and Dagobert. Knowing actually nothing of the result of the struggle which had taken place on the night in question, between her would-be liberator and the people belonging to the lunatic asylum and the convent, and it was in vain she inquired of her keepers, they would not even reply to her interrogatories.

These fresh incidents still more increased the bitter resentment which Adrienne entertained against the Princess de Saint-Dizier, the Père d'Aigrigny, and their creatures.

The slight paleness of the lovely face of Mademoiselle de Cardoville, her beautiful eyes, which appeared somewhat wearied, betrayed her recent anguish. Seated at a small table, with her head resting on one of her hands, and half hidden in the long tresses of her golden hair, she was turning over the leaves of a book, when the door suddenly opened and M. Baleinier entered.

The doctor, a Jesuit of the "short gown," the docile and passive instrument of the will of his order, was not, as we have said, but half in the confidence of Père d'Aigrigny and the Princess de Saint-Dizier. He was ignorant of the purpose of Mademoiselle de Cardoville's being immured; he was also ignorant of the abrupt change of position which had taken place on the previous day between Père d'Aigrigny and Rodin, after the reading of the will of Marius de Rennepont. The doctor had only received on the previous evening an order from Père d'Aigrigny (then obeying the instructions of Rodin) to shut up Mademoiselle de Cardoville still more closely, and to redouble his severity towards her; and to endeavour, in fact, to compel her (by what means we shall presently shew) to renounce her intention of prosecuting her persecutors hereafter.

At the sight of the doctor Mademoiselle de Cardoville could not conceal the aversion and disdain with which this man inspired her.

M. Baleinier, on the contrary, always smiling, always bland, approached Adrienne with perfect ease and self-possession, and then stepped a few paces from her as if to examine the young lady's features attentively: and he then said, as if he had been satisfied with the observation which he had made,—

"Well, well! the terrible events of the night before last have not had so bad an effect as I feared; the air better, the complexion is more settled, the gesture more composed, the eyes are still too animated, but no longer with that distressing lustre. You were going on so well—now the cure will be delayed, for the unfortunate transaction of the night before last has excited you more terribly than you yourself can believe; but, luckily, by great care, your restoration will not, I trust, be thrown back for any indefinite period."

Although somewhat accustomed to the audacity of the brother of the order, Mademoiselle de Cardoville could not help saying, with a smile of bitter disdain,—

"What a barefaced probity is yours, sir! what effrontery in your zeal to gain your money fairly! Never for a moment without your mask—always with the trick, the falsehood, on your lips. Really, if this disgraceful farce is as fatiguing to you as it is disgusting and contemptible in my eyes, you are not half paid for your labour."

"Alas!" said the doctor, in an accent of regret; "always this distressing idea that you have no occasion for our attentions! that I am acting a farce when I talk to you of the distressing state in which you were when we were compelled to bring you here without your consent. But, except this little proof of rebellious insanity, your position is marvellously ameliorated; you are going on towards a perfect cure. Hereafter your excellent heart will do me justice, and one day I shall be appreciated as I ought to be."

"You are right, sir! Yes, the day is at hand when you will 'be appreciated as you ought to be!'" responded Adrienne, with emphasis.

"Always that one fixed idea!" said the doctor, with a kind of commiseration. "Come, come, be reasonable! think no more of such childish imaginings."

"Give up my right and intention to appeal to the tribunal for reparation to myself and retribution for you and your accomplices? never, sir! oh, never!"

"Very good!" said the doctor, shrugging his shoulders; "once out of here, Dieu, merci! you will have other things to think of, my charming enemy."

"You are generous enough to forget the wrong you do; but I, sir, have a better memory."

"Let us talk seriously. Have you really the idea of applying to the tribunal?" asked Dr. Baleinier, in a serious tone.

"Yes, sir! and you know what I decide upon I decide upon with resolution."

"Well, then, I beg of you, I entreat you, not to follow up that intention!" added the doctor, in a most emphatic tone; "I ask it of you as a favour, and for the sake of your own interest."

"I think, sir, that you are somewhat confounding your interests with mine?"

"Let us see now," said Dr. Baleinier, with assumed impatience, and as if he was assured of convincing Mademoiselle de Cardoville, "now would you really have the mistaken courage to plunge into despair two persons filled with nobleness of heart and generosity of conduct?"

"Only two? the jest would be more complete if you would say three. Yourself, sir, my aunt, and the Abbé d'Aigrigny; for these are, no doubt, the generous personages in whose name you invoke my pity."

"Really, mademoiselle, I did not allude to myself, or your aunt, or the Abbé d'Aigrigny?"

"To whom else, then, did you refer, sir?" said Mademoiselle de Cardoville with surprise.

"I referred to two poor devils who, no doubt, sent by those you call your friends, obtained an entrance the other night into the adjacent convent, and came from thence into this garden. The reports you heard were shots fired at them."

"Alas! I was afraid it was so; and they refused to tell me whether or not they were wounded," said Adrienne, with painful emotion.

"One of them was wounded, though only slightly; for he contrived to keep on his legs and get away from the persons who pursued him."

"Heaven be praised!" exclaimed Mademoiselle de Cardoville, clasping her hands fervently.

"Nothing can be more praiseworthy than your joy on learning that they have escaped; but then by what strange contradiction would you now set justice on their heels? That is a singular mode, really, to acknowledge their devotion to your service!"

"What do you mean, sir?" inquired Mademoiselle de Cardoville.

"For if they are apprehended," continued Dr. Baleinier, not appearing to notice the question, "as they were unquestionably guilty of escalade with forcible entry during the night, they will be assuredly sentenced to the galleys."

"Heaven! and for me?"

"It would be for you, and, what is worse, through you, that they would be thus sentenced."

"Through me, sir?"

"Certainly, if you follow out your intentions of vengeance against your aunt and the Père d'Aigrigny (I do not think of myself, for I am quite protected); if, in a word, you persist in your determination to appeal to the law for having been unjustly immured in this house."

"Sir, I do not understand you—explain yourself!" said Adrienne, with increasing uneasiness.

"Why, child as you are," exclaimed the Jesuit of the short robe, with an impressive tone, "do you think, then, that when justice is once set on the track of an affair, that its course can be checked and its power directed as one will, and when one chooses? When you leave this abode, you will lodge your complaint against me and your family. Is it not so? Well, what will follow? Why justice will take the affair up, obtain every information, summon witnesses, and enter into all the most minute investigations. What will then result? Why, let this nocturnal escalade, which the superior of the convent has a certain interest in keeping quiet for fear of scandal, let this nocturnal attempt, I say,—which I, for my part, do not desire to have brought before the public,—be once openly divulged, and as there is mixed up with it a very grave offence, which incurs a disgraceful punishment, why justice will then take the initiative, and set its agents on the pursuit of these offenders; and if, as is probable, they are still in Paris, detained by any duties, or by their business, or under the idea that they are in perfect security (which they may believe, thinking that they have only acted on an honourable motive), they will be found and arrested; and who will have provoked their apprehension? why you, yourself, by deposing against us."

"Ah, sir! that would be horrible—it is impossible——"

"On the contrary, it would be very possible," said M. Baleinier;

“and so, whilst I and the superior of the convent, who, after all, have the only right to complain, desire nothing but to keep this annoying affair perfectly quiet—it is you—you, for whom these poor fellows have risked the galleys—you who will hand them over to justice.”

Although Mademoiselle de Cardoville was not completely the dupe of the Jesuit of the short robe, she guessed that the sentiments of clemency which he pretended to use towards Dagobert and his son would be absolutely regulated by the part she might take in prosecuting or abandoning the legitimate vengeance which she desired to obtain from the law.

In fact Rodin, whose instructions the doctor followed, although unconscious of it, was too cunning to say to Mademoiselle de Cardoville, “If you attempt any quest of justice, Dagobert and his son shall be denounced,” whilst they could arrive at the same end by inspiring Adrienne with such fears as to her two liberators as would turn her from her purpose; without being at all acquainted with the real law of the case, Mademoiselle de Cardoville had too much good sense not to see that Dagobert and Agricola might, indeed, be very greatly injured in consequence of their nocturnal attempt, and thus be involved in most terrible consequences.

Yet when she reflected on all she had suffered in this house, and turning over all the just resentments which had accumulated in the depths of her heart, Adrienne found it a bitter task to renounce the deep pleasure of unmasking and exposing all the vile machinations in the face of open day.

Doctor Baleinier looked at her, whom he believed his dupe, with crafty attention, quite assured that he penetrated the cause of her silence and hesitation.

“But, sir,” she resumed, without being able quite to conceal her trouble, “admitting that I should be disposed, from some motive or other, not to lodge any complaint, or begin an action at law—to forget the evil that has been heaped upon me, when shall I leave this house?”

“I cannot answer that question, for I am unable to decide on the period when you will be radically cured,” said the doctor, with a benignant smile; “you are on the highroad thither, but ——”

“Still this insolent and absurd farce,” exclaimed Mademoiselle de Cardoville, indignantly interrupting the doctor. “I ask you, and, if it be necessary, I beg of you to tell me how much time longer I shall be immured in this horrible abode? for I am to quit it some day or other, I suppose.”

“Certainly—assuredly—I hope so,” replied the Jesuit of the short robe, with an air of apparent regret; “but I cannot say precisely when. Besides, I must tell you frankly, that every prevention has been taken to prevent any repetition of such attempts as we had the night before last. The most rigorous watch has been established, in order that you may not have any communication out-of-doors; and this is all done for your good, and that your poor head may not be excited again so dangerously ——”

“Thus, then, sir,” said Adrienne, almost affrighted, “the days I have spent here may be considered as days of liberty in comparison with those which are now in store for me?”

"Your benefit is the first consideration," replied the doctor, with an affectionate air.

Mademoiselle de Cardoville, feeling the inutility of her indignation and despair, heaved a bitter sigh, and hid her face in her hands.

At this instant rapid steps were heard without, and one of the women-keepers entered, after having knocked at the door.

"Sir," she said, with a frightened look, "there are two gentlemen down stairs who demand to see you and this young lady."

Adrienne raised her head: her eyes were bathed in tears.

"What are the names of these persons?" inquired Dr. Baleinier, greatly astonished.

"One of them told me," answered the keeper, "to say to monsieur the doctor that he was a magistrate, and had come here to execute a judicial duty concerning Mademoiselle de Cardoville."

"A magistrate!" exclaimed the Jesuit of the short robe, becoming purple, and unable to repress his surprise and disquietude.

"Oh, Heaven be praised!" exclaimed Adrienne, rising quickly, and her face beaming with hope through her tears; "my friends have been warned, and the hour of justice is at hand."

"Beg these persons to come upstairs," said Dr. Baleinier to the keeper, after a moment's reflection.

Then, with his countenance more and more moved and troubled, the Jesuit of the short robe went towards Adrienne with a severe and almost threatening look, which contracted strangely with his habitual placidity and hypocritical smile, and said, in a low tone,—

"Take care, Mademoiselle, do not congratulate yourself too soon."

"I do not fear you now!" replied Mademoiselle de Cardoville, with her eye lighted up and radiant with hope, "M. de Montbron, no doubt, has returned to Paris, and has been informed: it is he who is accompanied by the magistrate, and he comes to free me!"

Then Adrienne added, in a tone of bitter irony,—

"I pity you, sir,—you and your friends."

"Mademoiselle," exclaimed M. Baleinier, unable to conceal his increasing trepidation; "I repeat—take care—remember what I have said to you—your complaint will necessarily include, you understand necessarily, the revelation of all that transpired the other night; take care, the fate, the honour of the soldier and his son are in your hands—reflect, they have the galleys before them."

"Oh, I am not your dupe, sir; you threaten me covertly: have the courage to tell me that if I complain to this magistrate you will instantly denounce the soldier and his son."

"I repeat, that if you commence your complaint, those persons are utterly lost," replied the lay Jesuit in ambiguous terms.

A good deal disturbed by the real danger which there might be in the threats of the doctor, Adrienne exclaimed,—

"But, then, sir, if this magistrate interrogates me, do you think I will utter a falsehood?"

"You will reply, and tell the truth. Besides," said M. Baleinier, in rapid tones, in the hopes of achieving his purpose; "you will reply that you were in such an excited state of mind for some days that it was thought advisable, for your health's sake, to conduct you hither without apprising you, but that now you are infinitely better, and are fully convinced of the utility of the precautions that were taken for your benefit. I will confirm all this; for, after all, it is the truth."

"Never!" exclaimed Mademoiselle de Cardoville, indignantly; "I will never be the accomplice of so infamous a falsehood. I will never so degrade myself as to justify the indignities under which I suffered so painfully."

"Here is the magistrate," said Dr. Baleinier, hearing a noise outside the door, "and now, take care ——"

The door opened at this moment; and, to the utter astonishment of the doctor, Rodin appeared, accompanied by a man dressed in black, and of a lofty and stern demeanour.

Rodin, for the sake of working out his plans, and from the deepest motives of prudence (which we shall reveal hereafter), far from informing Père d'Aigrigny and the doctor of his unexpected visit, which he intended to pay at the Maison de Santé, attended by a magistrate, had, on the contrary, on the previous evening, as we know, given an order to Dr. Baleinier to confine Mademoiselle de Cardoville still more strictly.

We must imagine the increase of the doctor's astonishment when he saw the officer of justice, whose unexpected presence and imposing aspect already greatly disquieted him, when he saw him enter, accompanied by Rodin, the humble and obscure secretary of the Abbé d'Aigrigny.

As they entered the door Rodin, still meanly dressed, had, with a gesture, at once compassionate and respectful, pointed out Mademoiselle de Cardoville to the magistrate. Then, whilst the latter, who could not repress a movement of admiration at the sight of Adrienne's exceeding beauty, seemed to examine her with as much surprise as interest, the Jesuit humbly retired a few paces into the back-ground.

Dr. Baleinier, in perfect amaze, and hoping to make Rodin understand him, made several signs of intelligence to him, endeavouring to interrogate him as to the unexpected arrival of the magistrate.

Another subject of surprise for Dr. Baleinier:—Rodin did not appear to recognise him, nor to understand his expressive pantomime, but gazed at him in affected wonder.

At length the doctor, out of all patience, redoubled his mute interrogatories; and then, Rodin advancing a step, stretched out his bent neck towards him, and said, in a very loud voice,—

"What is it you want to say to me, Monsieur le Docteur?"

At these words, which completely disconcerted Baleinier, and which broke the silence which had reigned for some seconds, the magistrate turned round, and Rodin added, with the most imperturbable sang froid,

"Since we came in M. le Docteur has been making all sorts of mysterious signs to me. I imagine that he has something very particular to communicate to me; but, as I have no secrets, I beg he will be so good as explain out loud what he means."

This reply, so embarrassing to Dr. Baleinier, pronounced in an offensive tone, and accompanied by a look of icy coldness, again plunged the doctor into astonishment so great, that for several moments he was wholly unable to reply.

Unquestionably the magistrate was struck by this fact, and the silence that followed, for he threw on Dr. Baleinier a look of extreme rdoville, who had expected to see M. de Monto in a state of extreme surprise.

CHAPTER XVIII.

THE ACCUSER.

DR. BALEINIER, for a moment disconcerted by the unexpected presence of a magistrate, and the inexplicable conduct of Rodin, soon returned his sang froid, and thus addressed his brother of the short robe :—

“If I endeavoured to make myself understood by signs, it was because, whilst desirous of shewing my respect for the silence which this gentleman (and he looked towards the magistrate) has kept since he entered my house, I wished also to testify my surprise at a visit with which I did not expect to be honoured.”

“It is to this young lady that I am to explain the motive of my silence, sir, whilst I will beg her to excuse me,” replied the magistrate, and bowing slightly to Adrienne, he continued to address her. “I have had much before me, Mademoiselle, in your name; so very serious a charge, that I could not help remaining for an instant mute and observant in your presence, endeavouring to read in your countenance, your attitude, if the accusation deposed to in my presence was founded in truth; and I have now every reason to give the fullest credit to it.”

“May I then know, sir,” inquired Doctor Baleinier, in a tone, firm, but perfectly polite, “to whom I have the honour of addressing myself?”

“Sir, I am juge d’instruction; and I came here to do my duty in a matter to which my attention has been seriously directed.”

“Will you, sir, deign to explain yourself to me?” asked the doctor, with a bow.

“Sir,” answered the magistrate, whose name was M. de Gernande, a man about fifty years of age, of firm mind and upright principles, and who knew perfectly how to unite the austere duties of his office with the most gentlemanly politeness,—“Sir, you are accused of having committed a very gross error, not to make use of a more severe expression. As to the nature of this error, I should rather prefer to believe that you, sir, one of the princes of science, have been completely deceived in your medical opinion, than suspect you of having forgotten all that is most sacred in the exercise of a profession which is almost sacerdotal —”

“When, sir, you have specified the facts,” responded the Jesuit of the short robe, with a certain hauteur, “it will be easy for me to prove that my scientific conscience, as well as my conscience as an honest man, are free from the slightest reproach."

"Mademoiselle," said M. de Gernande, addressing Adrienne, "is it true that you were conducted to this house by stratagem?"

"Sir," exclaimed M. Baleinier, "allow me to observe that the way in which you put that question reflects painfully on me."

"Sir, it is to Mademoiselle that I have the honour now to address myself," replied M. de Gernande, sternly; "and I am the only judge of the suitability of my questions."

Adrienne was about to reply in the affirmative to the magistrate's question when an expressive look from Dr. Baleinier reminded her that, perhaps, she should thereby expose Dagobert and his son to a vindictive prosecution.

It was no low and common feeling of vengeance which animated Adrienne, but a legitimate indignation against the most hateful hypocrisy: she would have thought it cowardly not to unmask this; but desirous to conciliate, if possible, she said to the magistrate, in a voice full of sweetness and dignity:—

"Sir, allow me in my turn to ask you a question."

"By all means, Mademoiselle."

"Shall you consider the reply I make as a formal denunciation?"

"I am here, Mademoiselle, to discover the truth under all circumstances—no consideration should induce you to endeavour to conceal it for an instant."

"Assuredly not, sir," replied Adrienne; "but, suppose that, having just grounds of complaint, I expose them to you in order to obtain your authority for leaving this abode, shall I hereafter be free not to follow up the charges I may now bring before you?"

"You may unquestionably abandon such charges, Mademoiselle, but justice will take up your cause in the name of society at large, if it has been maltreated in your person."

"Would forgiveness then be denied me, sir? A contemptuous forgetfulness of the ills I have suffered would surely adequately avenge me."

"You may concede your personal forgiveness and forgetfulness, Mademoiselle; but I have the honour to repeat to you that society cannot evince the same indulgence under the certainty that you have been the victim of a culpable machination; and I have every fear that such has been the case. The manner in which you express yourself, the generosity of your expressions, the calmness, the dignity of your attitude—all combine to make me believe that the truth has been deposed to before me."

"I hope, sir," interposed Doctor Baleinier, who had now resumed all his habitual phlegm, "that you will, at least, inform me by whom this deposition was made."

"It has been affirmed to me, sir," replied the magistrate, in a tone of severity, "that Mademoiselle was conducted hither by stratagem."

"By stratagem?"

"Yes, sir."

"It is true that Mademoiselle was conducted hither by stratagem," replied the Jesuit of the short robe, after a moment's pause.

"You assent to it," said M. de Gernande.

"I do, sir; I confess that I employed a means which we are unfortunately compelled to resort to when the persons who have need of our cures have not the consciousness of their sad state."

"But, sir," said the magistrate, "it is asserted, in my presence, that Mademoiselle de Cardoville never had any need of your cures."

"That is a question of legal medicine, in which the law alone is not called upon to decide, sir, and which must be examined into, and debated in all its bearings," said Dr. Baleinier, with all his usual assurance.

"The question can't, in effect, be more seriously debated, inasmuch as you are charged with having immured Mademoiselle de Cardoville here, although she was not in perfect possession of all her reason."

"And may I ask for what end?" said Dr. Baleinier, with a slight shrug of the shoulders, and in an ironical tone; "for what purpose could I have committed such an indignity, admitting, for an instant, that my reputation does not place me above such an odious and absurd accusation?"

"You may have acted, sir, with the purpose of favouring a family-plot got up against Mademoiselle de Cardoville with an avaricious design."

"And who, sir, has dared to make so calumnious an accusation?" exclaimed Dr. Baleinier, with wrathful indignation. "Who has had the audacity to accuse a respectable man,—and I will add, respected by all,—of having been an accomplice in such an infamous transaction?"

"I did," said Rodin, calmly.

"You!" exclaimed Dr. Baleinier; and, recoiling two or three steps, he seemed as though thunderstruck.

"Yes, it is I who accuse you," responded Rodin, in a sharp, clear voice.

"Yes, it was this gentleman who, this very morning, armed with adequate proofs, came to demand my intervention in favour of Mademoiselle de Cardoville," said the magistrate, who retreated a step, that Adrienne might perceive her defender.

During this scene Rodin's name had not yet been mentioned. Mademoiselle de Cardoville had often heard speak of the secretary of the Abbé d'Aigrigny in terms of obloquy, but, never having seen him, she was ignorant that her liberator was no other than this Jesuit; and she, therefore, looked at him with a glance, mingled with curiosity, surprise, interest, and gratitude.

The cadaverous countenance of Rodin, his repulsive ugliness, his sordid attire, would, some days before, have excited in Adrienne a disgust, perhaps, unconquerable; but the young girl, remembering that La Mayeux, poor, mean, deformed, and clad in rags, was endowed, in spite of her unprepossessing exterior, with one of the noblest hearts that can beat in a human bosom—this recollection was singularly favourable to the Jesuit—Mademoiselle de Cardoville forgot that he was ugly and squalid, and only saw that he was old, seemed poor, and came to rescue her.

Dr. Baleinier, in spite of his craft—in spite of his bold-faced hypocrisy—in spite of his presence of mind, could not disguise the extent to which Rodin's denunciation affected him ; and he was quite bewildered when he remembered that it was the implacable directions of Rodin, through the wicket of the chamber, which had prevented him—him, Baleinier, from yielding to the pity with which the despairing anguish of this unhappy young lady, who, almost doubted herself of her own security, had inspired him.

And it was he, Rodin—he, so inexorable—he, the attendant demon, the devoted subaltern of Père d'Aigrigny, who denounced the doctor, and brought the magistrate to obtain the release of Adrienne, when, the evening previous, Père d'Aigrigny had again commanded him to redouble his severity towards her !

The Jesuit of the short robe persuaded himself that Rodin betrayed the Père d'Aigrigny most infamously ; and that the friends of Mademoiselle de Cardoville had corrupted and seduced the miserable secretary ; and then Dr. Baleinier, exasperated at what he considered as base treachery, exclaimed again, with indignation, and in a voice half choked with rage,—

“It is you, sir, who have dared thus to accuse me—you, who but a few days since ——”

Then, reflecting that to accuse Rodin as an accomplice was to accuse himself, he assumed an air of excessive emotion, and continued with bitterness,—

“Ah, sir, sir ! you are the last person I should have thought capable of preferring so shameful a denunciation—it is infamous.”

“And who better than myself could denounce such infamy ?” said Rodin, in an abrupt and harsh tone. “Was I not in a position to learn, but unfortunately too late, the machinations by which Mademoiselle de Cardoville and others had been the victims ? What, then, was my duty as an honest man ? To inform the worshipful magistrate, and prove to him what I advanced by accompanying him hither ; and this is what I have done.”

“Then, monsieur le magistrat,” resumed Dr. Baleinier, “it is not only myself whom this man accuses, but he dares also to accuse besides ——”

“I accuse M. l'Abbé d'Aigrigny,” interrupted Rodin, in a loud and piercing voice ; “I accuse Madame de Saint-Dizier ; I accuse you, sir,—you, sir, of having, from base and interested motives, immured Mademoiselle de Cardoville in this house, and the daughters of M. le Maréchal Simon in the adjacent convent. Is this clear ?”

“Alas ! it is but too true,” said Adrienne, with energy ; “I have seen the poor, unhappy girls, who made signs to me of their deep despair.”

The accusation of Rodin relative to the orphan girls was a fresh and formidable blow for Dr. Baleinier. He was then thoroughly convinced that the traitor had completely passed over to the enemy's camp. Being, therefore, desirous to put an end to his embarrassing position, he said to the magistrate, endeavouring to assume as good a countenance as he could, in spite of his deep emotion,—

“I might, sir, confine myself to silence, and thus evince my contempt for such charges, until a judicial investigation shall have stamped them with some authority ; but, strong in the rectitude of my conscience, I address myself to Mademoiselle de Cardoville herself, and I entreat her to say if, even this very morning, I did not announce to her that her health would soon be in so satisfactory a state that she might leave this house. I adjure mademoiselle, by her well-known sincerity, to answer me if such was not my language; and if, when I said so, I was not alone with her, and if ——”

“Ah, come, sir!” said Rodin, insolently interrupting Baleinier; “suppose this dear young lady avows this from pure generosity, what does that prove in your favour? Nothing at all ——”

“What, sir!” exclaimed the doctor, “do you venture ——”

“I venture to unmask you without asking your leave; it is unpleasant, no doubt; but what does all you have just said amount to? Why, that, alone with Mademoiselle de Cardoville, you have spoken to her as if she were really insane! Parbleu! that is very conclusive, really!”

“But, sir ——” said the doctor.

“But, sir,” interrupted Rodin, without allowing him to continue, “it is evident that, in anticipation of what happened, and has happened to-day, in order to have a hole to creep out of, you feigned to be persuaded of your execrable falsehood, even in the presence of this poor young lady, in order that hereafter, if requisite, you might appeal to the fact of your assumed conviction on the point. Come, come! it is not people of right mind and good hearts who bind themselves to such statements or such transactions.”

“Really, sir ——” exclaimed Baleinier, much exasperated.

“Really, sir,” said Rodin, in a still louder voice, and which completely drowned the doctor’s; “is it true, or is it not, that you hold in reserve the evasion of throwing this infamous immurement on a scientific error? I say yes; and I add, that you think yourself out of the scrape, because you now say, ‘Thanks to my cures, mademoiselle has recovered her reason; what more is there required?’”

“I affirm that, sir, and I maintain it.”

“You maintain a falsehood; for it is proved that the reason of mademoiselle was never, for an instant, deranged.”

“And I, sir, maintain that the reason of Mademoiselle de Cardoville was completely impaired.”

“I am prepared to prove the contrary,” answered Rodin.

“You!” exclaimed the doctor; “and by what means can you do that?”

“Excuse me there!” replied Rodin, with an ironical smile. “You will perfectly understand my reasons for being silent at present.” Then, assuming an indignant air, he added, “It reflects no small disgrace on you, however, sir, to have permitted the discussion of such a subject in the presence of this young lady. She might well have been spared this fresh trial to her feelings.”

“Sir?”

“I say again, sir, shame on you for permitting this poor lady to be pained and harassed by so distressing a conversation; your conduct is alike unmanly and improper, whether you speak the words of truth or falsehood.”

“This is past all endurance!” exclaimed the Jesuit of the short robe, exasperated beyond all further restraint; “and I can but accuse that gentleman (pointing to the magistrate) of undue partiality in permitting me to be assailed by such gross and calumnious assertions."

"I beg your pardon, sir!" answered M. de Gernande, sternly. "I am perfectly acquainted with the duties I have to perform, and that I am required, by virtue of my office, not only to permit, but even to provoke, controversy and dispute in argument, the better to arrive at the truth of the affair. It appears to me, even by your own confession, that in whatever state the mind of Mademoiselle de Cardoville may have been, she is now, at least, sufficiently restored to health, whether of body or mind, to be permitted to quit this establishment immediately."

"Why," said the doctor, hesitatingly, "I certainly see no positive reason against it; what I insist on is that the cure is not sufficiently confirmed, and that I must totally decline being answerable for what may occur."

"Be under no apprehension, sir, I beseech you," said Rodin, "as to any future responsibility attaching itself to you. It is scarcely possible, after the specimens this poor young lady has had of your skill and integrity, she will be induced to trust either her bodily or mental ailments in your hands."

"I have, therefore, no occasion to employ my official authority to compel you to afford immediate egress to Mademoiselle de Cardoville," said the magistrate to the doctor.

"The young lady is free to depart whenever she pleases," answered Baleinier: "perfectly so, as far as I am concerned."

"As for the question of your having unduly and unjustly immured the lady under a false charge of madness, that will be duly investigated; the affair being in the hands of the judicial authorities, you will have every opportunity of clearing yourself from so foul a charge."

"I am under no fears, sir, as to the result of such an investigation," said Dr. Baleinier, affecting a calm and composed mien; "my conscience exculpates me from all blame, and I rather court inquiry than shun it."

"I trust it may prove so," said M. de Gernande; "for, however appearances may be against persons, more especially those occupying a position of such eminence as yours, we are always truly rejoiced when they can satisfactorily prove their innocence." Then, addressing Adrienne, he said, "I can well understand, mademoiselle, how painful such a scene as the present must be both to your generosity and delicacy. It will be optional with you either to institute a civil process against Dr. Baleinier, or to allow justice to take its course. One word more: that noble-hearted individual," pointing to Rodin, "who has so fearlessly and disinterestedly espoused your cause, intimated to me that he had every reason to believe you would wish to take immediate charge of the daughters of M. le Maréchal Simon; and I am now going to demand them from the convent, whither they, also, were conveyed under a feigned pretext."

"Indeed, sir," replied Adrienne, "from the moment I first learnt of the arrival of Maréchal Simon's daughters in Paris, my first impulse was to offer to receive them beneath my roof; these young ladies are my nearest relatives, and it would be at once my duty and pleasure to treat them in every respect as though they were my sisters. I shall, therefore, feel my obligations to you doubly great, if you will permit them to be intrusted to my care."

"It appears to me," replied M. de Gernande, "that, independently of my desire to meet your wishes, my dear young lady, I can in no way better secure the happiness and the best interests of your young relatives." Then, addressing Dr. Baleinier, he said, "Have you any objection, sir, to my bringing the Mesdemoiselles Simon here? if not, I will fetch them while Mademoiselle de Cardoville is preparing for her departure: they can then accompany their kind friend and relative, and all return together."

"I beg Mademoiselle de Cardoville will make use of this house as though it were her own while awaiting her friends; upon their arrival my carriage shall be at her disposal, to conduct her wherever she pleases."

"Mademoiselle," said the magistrate, approaching Adrienne, "without in any way prejudging the question, which will shortly be brought before the courts of law, I may, at least, express my regret at not having been applied to sooner on your behalf. I might have spared you some days of cruel suffering, for I can well imagine how much you must have had to endure."

"One happy recollection," said Adrienne, with graceful dignity, "will remain, even of these days of sorrow and suffering, that of the generous part you have taken in my case; for which I trust to thank you more fully when again beneath my own roof, and to assure you of my lasting sense, not only of the justice you have accorded me, but also for the benevolent, I would even venture to say paternal, manner in which you have performed the service; and I trust, sir," added Mademoiselle de Cardoville, with one of her sweetest smiles, "to be able satisfactorily to prove to you that my cure is too complete to leave the slightest apprehensions of a relapse."

M. de Gernande bowed respectfully to Mademoiselle de Cardoville.

During the short conversation between the two latter individuals, they had both turned their back upon Dr. Baleinier and Rodin. The latter, profiting by the circumstance, quickly thrust into the hands of the doctor a small billet he had hastily scrawled with a pencil in the bottom of his hat. Scarcely had Baleinier perused the hurried lines than he cast a look of mingled wonder and stupefaction at Rodin, who replied to the glance of wondering surprise by making a private sign, which consisted in carrying the thumb to the forehead, then drawing it twice across in a vertical direction; this done he resumed his usual impassive look and manner.

All this passed so rapidly, that when M. de Gernande turned round Rodin was standing at some distance from Dr. Baleinier, and regarding Mademoiselle de Cardoville with respectful interest.

"Allow me to conduct you down stairs, sir!" said the doctor, preceding the magistrate, on whom Adrienne bestowed a farewell salutation, replete with graceful affability.

Rodin now remained alone with Mademoiselle de Cardoville.

Having conducted M. de Gernande to the very door, Dr. Baleinier paused to read the paper so hastily traced with a pencil, and given to him so mysteriously by Rodin. It ran thus:—

"The magistrate will proceed to the convent by the street. Do you hasten with all speed across the garden, and desire the superior to attend to the order I have given relative to the two young girls placed there ; it is of the utmost importance she should do so."

The sign made by Rodin, as well as the tenor of this billet, abundantly convinced Baleinier, almost staggering as he was beneath the multiplied surprises and astounding events of the day, that the secretary of the Rev. Father d'Aigrigny, so far from attempting to betray his party, was still acting for the great glory of the Lord. Still, while implicitly obeying, Dr. Baleinier sought in vain to comprehend the inexplicable conduct of Rodin, in making an affair public it was so necessary to keep concealed, and which might in its results so fearfully involve not only the Rev. Father d'Aigrigny, the Princess de Saint-Dizier, but Baleinier himself.

* * * * *

We will now return to Rodin, whom we left alone with Mademoiselle de Cardoville.

CHAPTER XIX.

THE EX-SECRETARY OF PÈRE D'AIGRIGNY.

SCARCELY had the magistrate and Dr. Baleinier disappeared, than Mademoiselle de Cardoville, whose countenance was radiant with joy, cried, as she looked at Rodin with a mixture of respect and gratitude,—

"Then at last, thanks to you, sir, I am free ! Free ! oh, I never thought before that there was so much delight, expansiveness, and ecstasy, in that adorable word liberty !"

And Adrienne's bosom palpitated, her rosy nostrils expanded, her vermilion lips half opened, as if she inspired, with supreme happiness, a pure and vivifying air.

"I have been but a few days in this horrible house," she continued, "but I have suffered enough in my captivity to make a vow to release annually a certain number of poor prisoners confined for debt. This vow may appear to you rather antiquated," she added, with a smile, "but we must not borrow from the middle ages merely their furniture and looking-glasses. Thanks then, sir, doubly ; for I make you a participator in this thought of deliverance, which I have just resolved on, as you see, in the midst of the happiness which I owe to you, and with which you seem moved — touched. Ah, let my joy be taken as my gratitude, and may it repay you for your generous succour !" said the young maiden, enthusiastically.

Mademoiselle had, in fact, remarked a complete change in the countenance of Rodin. This man, lately so stern, so rude, so inflexible with Dr. Baleinier, seemed now under the influence of the most gentle and tender sentiments. His small viperous eyes, half hid by their dropping lids, were fixed on Adrienne with an expression of indescribable interest. Then, as if he would shake off these impressions, he said, as if speaking to himself,—

ADRIENNE'S RELEASE.

"Nonsense—folly! no weakness! time is too precious—my mission is not yet fulfilled. No, it is not, my dear young lady," he added, addressing Adrienne; "come, come! we will talk of gratitude hereafter. Let us now talk, and rapidly, too, of you and your family. Do you know what has occurred?"

Adrienne regarded the Jesuit with surprise, and said to him,—

"What has occurred, sir?"

"Do you know the real motive of your immurement in this house? Do you know what has made Madame de Saint-Dizier and the Abbé d'Aigrigny act as they have done?"

On hearing these detested names pronounced, the features of Mademoiselle de Cardoville, which but a moment before had been radiant with happiness, became saddened; and she replied, with bitterness,—

"Hatred, sir, no doubt animated Madame de Saint-Dizier against me."

"Yes, hatred; and, moreover, the desire to see you despoiled basely of an immense fortune."

"Me, sir! and how?"

"You do not then know, my dear young lady, the interest which you had in being on the 13th of February in the Rue St.-François for an inheritance?"

"I know nothing of this date nor of these details, sir; but I know, imperfectly, by some family papers, and through a very extraordinary circumstance, that one of our ancestors——"

"Had bequeathed an enormous sum to be divided amongst his descendants, was it not?"

"Yes, sir."

"What, unfortunately, you do not know, my dear young lady, is that the heirs were bound to be present on the 13th of February, at a fixed hour; and that, that day and hour past, those who did not present themselves were to be utterly dispossessed. Do you now comprehend, my dear young lady, why you were shut up here?"

"Oh, yes, I do!" exclaimed Mademoiselle de Cardoville; "to the hatred which she bore me my aunt joined sordid cupidity,—all is now explained. The daughters of General Simon, co-heiresses with me, have been in like manner immured."

"And yet," exclaimed Rodin, "you and they are not the sole victims."

"Who are the others, sir?"

"A young Indian——"

"Prince Djalma?" asked Adrienne, eagerly.

"Has been nearly poisoned by a narcotic for the same motive."

"Oh, heaven!" exclaimed the young lady, clasping her hands with horror; "how horrible! He!—he!—the young prince whose character was so noble and so generous? But I had sent to the Château de Cardoville——"

"A man in whom you could confide to bring the prince to Paris. I know that, my dear young lady; but by a stratagem that person was removed, and the young Indian delivered up to his——"

"And where is he at this moment?"

"I have but vague traces of him: I only know that he is in Paris, but I do not despair of recovering him. I will make every search that paternal anxiety can suggest, for one cannot too much admire the rare qualities of this poor king's son. What a heart! my dear young lady, what a heart! Oh, it is a heart of gold, as bright and pure as the gold of his native country!"

"But the prince must be found, sir!" said Adrienne, with emotion; "nothing must be neglected to effect this. I conjure you to set about it! He is my relative—he is here alone, without help, without succour!"

"He is, indeed!" observed Rodin, with sympathy, "poor child—for he is still a child, only eighteen or nineteen years of age—thrown into the heart of Paris, into this hell, with his young, ardent, wild passions—with his simplicity and his self-dependence—to what dangers would he not be exposed?"

"It is the more necessary, sir, that we should find him immediately," said Adrienne, energetically, "in order to withdraw him from these dangers. Before I was shut up here, when I learned of his arrival in France, I had sent a trusty person to offer to him the services of an unknown friend. I now see that this idea, with which my aunt reproached me as so foolish, was very sensible, and I now abide by it more strongly than ever. The prince belongs to my family, and I owe him a generous hospitality. I intended the pavilion which I occupied at my aunt's for him."

"But you, my dear young lady?"

"This very day I shall go and inhabit a house which I had been for some time fitting up, having decidedly resolved on leaving Madame de Saint-Dizier, and living alone and as I please. Now, sir, since it is your mission to be the good genius of our family, be also equally generous towards the Prince Djalma as you have been to me and the daughters of General Simon. I entreat you to try and discover the retreat of the poor king's son, as you call him, and conduct him to the pavilion which an unknown friend offers him. Let him not disturb himself about any thing; all his wants shall be provided for, and he shall live, as he ought to do, en prince!"

"Yes, he will live en prince, thanks to your regal munificence. But never was the tenderest interest better placed. It is enough to see, as I have seen, his handsome, melancholy countenance, in order——"

"What! have you seen him, sir?" inquired Adrienne, interrupting Rodin.

"Yes, my dear young lady, I have seen him for about two hours, and more was not requisite in order to appreciate him. His charming features are the mirror of his soul!"

"And where did you see him, sir?"

"At your ancient Château de Cardoville, my dear young lady, not far from which the tempest had cast him, and where I had gone for——"

Then, after a moment's hesitation, Rodin added, as if carried away in spite of himself,—

"Eh! where I had gone to commit a very shameless, disgraceful, and infamous act, I must confess it."

"You, sir?—at the Château de Cardoville! and to do a shameless act?" exclaimed Adrienne de Cardoville, greatly surprised.

"Alas, yes, my dear young lady!" replied Rodin, unhesitatingly. "In a word, I had instructions from M. l'Abbé d'Aigrigny to offer to your old land-steward the alternative of being sent away, or of lending himself to an unworthy transaction—yes, to something very closely akin to spying and slander, but the honest and worthy man refused."

"Who, then, are you, sir?" asked Mademoiselle de Cardoville, more and more surprised.

"I am—Rodin—the ex-secretary of M. l'Abbé d'Aigrigny; a very insignificant person, as you see!"

It is impossible to describe the tone of the Jesuit, at once humble and ingenuous, as he uttered these words, which he accompanied with a lowly reverence.

At this disclosure Mademoiselle de Cardoville started back.

We have said Adrienne had sometimes heard speak of Rodin, the humble secretary of the Abbé d'Aigrigny, as a sort of machine, obedient and passive. That was not all. The land-steward of Cardoville, when writing to Adrienne on the subject of Prince Djalma, complained of the perfidious and disloyal proposals of Rodin. She felt, therefore, a vague distrust arise in her mind when she learned that her liberator was the man who had played so odious a part. Still this unfavourable sentiment was balanced by what she now owed to Rodin, and by the accusation which he had just so plainly and unhesitatingly made against the Abbé d'Aigrigny before the magistrate; and then, again, by the very avowal of the Jesuit himself, who, accusing himself, anticipated every reproach that could be directed against him.

Still it was with a kind of cold reserve that Mademoiselle de Cardoville continued the conversation which she had commenced with as much frankness as enthusiasm and sympathy.

Rodin saw the impression that had been made—he expected it—and was not the least in the world disconcerted when Mademoiselle de Cardoville said to him, as she looked him full in the face, and fastened on him her piercing gaze,—

"Oh! you are Monsieur Rodin—the secretary of M. l'Abbé d'Aigrigny?"

"Say ex-secretary, if you please, dear young lady!" replied the Jesuit; "for you must know very well that I can never again place my feet in the residence of the Abbé d'Aigrigny. I have converted him into an implacable enemy, and I am consequently thrust into the streets. But no matter! What do I say? But so much the better, since, at this cost, the wicked are unmasked and honest people saved!"

These words, so uttered, very simply, but with a degree of dignity, roused the pity of Adrienne's heart. She thought that, after all, the poor old man spoke the truth. The hatred of the Abbé d'Aigrigny, thus aroused, would, of course, be inexorable. And, after all, Rodin had braved it in order to make a noble disclosure.

Still Mademoiselle de Cardoville replied coldly,—

"Since you knew, sir, that the offers you were charged to make to the land-steward of Cardoville were so disgraceful and perfidious, why did you consent to be the bearer of them?"

"Why?—why?" inquired Rodin, with a sort of painful impatience; "because I was at that time completely under the charm of the Abbé d'Aigrigny, one of the most prodigiously insinuating and skilful men, and—I only learned the day before yesterday—one of the most prodigiously dangerous men in the world. He had overcome my scruples by persuading me that the end justifies the means; and I must confess that the end he proposed was great and seducing. But the day before yesterday I was most cruelly disabused—a peal of thunder awakened me. I pray you," added Rodin, with a sort of confusion and embarrassment, "do not let us speak again of my disgraceful journey to Cardoville. Although I was but the ignorant and blind instrument, I am as much shamed and vexed as if I had acted for myself. It oppresses me—weighs on my heart. I entreat you, then, let us rather speak of yourself, and what concerns you—for the soul dilates at generous sentiments, as the chest expands in a pure and salubrious air."

Rodin had made so spontaneous an avowal of his fault, had explained it so naturally, and appeared so sincerely contrite, that Adrienne, whose suspicions had no other grounds, felt her distrust gradually decrease.

"So, then, it was at Cardoville," she continued, still keeping her eyes fixed on Rodin, "that you saw the Prince Djalma?"

"Yes, mademoiselle; and, from that brief interview, my affection for him began. I will, therefore, fulfil my task to the end. Be tranquil, my dear lady—the prince shall not be the victim of this infamous conspiracy any more than yourself or the daughters of Marshal Simon—although, unfortunately, it has not stopped there."

"Who, then, has it threatened beside?"

"M. Hardy, a man of honour and worth, also your kinsman, and equally interested in this succession, has been withdrawn from Paris by infamous treachery; and then another heir, an unfortunate artisan, falling into a snare skilfully laid for him, has been thrown into prison for debt."

"But, sir," said Adrienne, quickly, "for whose profit was this abominable conspiracy, which actually frightens me, concocted?"

"For the profit of M. l'Abbé d'Aigrigny!" replied Rodin.

"For him? And how?—to what end? He was not an heir!"

"It is too long to explain to you now, my dear young lady; you will know all one day. Only be assured, that your family has no enemy more inveterate than the Abbé d'Aigrigny!"

"Sir," said Adrienne, impressed with a sudden suspicion, "I will speak frankly with you. What have I done to deserve or to inspire you with the lively interest which you testify towards me, and which you extend, in fact, to all the members of my family?"

"Indeed, my dear young lady," exclaimed Rodin, with a smile, "if I were to tell you, you would only smile or not believe me."

"Speak, I beg of you, sir! Do not doubt either me or yourself."

"Well, then, I am interested in, devoted to you, because your heart is generous, your mind elevated, your disposition independent and haughty. Once attached to you, ma foi! those belonging to you, who are, besides, all worthy of interest, are not indifferent to me. To serve them is still to serve you."

"But, sir, admitting that you judge me worthy of the too-flattering compliments you are pleased to address to me, how could you judge of my heart, my mind, my disposition?"

"I will tell you, my dear young lady. But, first, I ought to make a confession which makes me feel greatly ashamed. Even if you were not so wonderfully gifted, what you have suffered since your arrival in this house ought surely to excite for you the interest of every man with a heart in his bosom!"

"I think so, sir."

"I may, then, thus explain my interest in you. But still, I confess, that would not be sufficient for me. Had you been only Mademoiselle de Cardoville, very rich, very noble, and very lovely, then, no doubt, your ill usage would have excited my pity. But I should have said to myself, 'This poor young lady is greatly to be pitied, no doubt; but then, what can a poor man like me do? My only resource is my situation as secretary of the Abbé d'Aigrigny, and it is he that I should first attack. He is all-powerful—I am nothing! To contend with him is to lose the hope of saving this ill-used young lady.' Then, on the contrary, knowing what you were, my dear young lady, ma foi! I revolted, even inferior as I was! 'No, no,' I said, 'a thousand times no! So intelligent an understanding, so noble a heart, shall not be the victims of such an abominable conspiracy. Perhaps I shall be destroyed in the struggle; but, at least, I shall have dared to attempt it.'"

It is impossible to describe the mixture of finesse, energy, and feeling, with which Rodin pronounced these words.

As often occurs to persons excessively uncouth and repulsive, as soon as they have contrived to have their ugliness forgotten, that very ugliness becomes a matter of interest and commiseration; and we say, "What a pity that such a mind, such a soul, should occupy such a frame!" and we are struck, and, as it were, softened by the contrast.

It was thus that Mademoiselle de Cardoville began to feel for Rodin; for, in the same proportion that he had shewn himself brutal and insolent to Dr. Baleinier, had he been simple and tender towards her.

One thing only deeply excited the curiosity of Mademoiselle de Cardoville: it was, to know how Rodin had conceived the devotion and admiration with which she had inspired him.

"Excuse my indiscreet and obstinate curiosity, sir; but I should like to know——"

"How I acquired the knowledge of your moral character, is it not? Indeed, my dear young lady, nothing is more simple. In two words I will tell you. The Abbé d'Aigrigny considered me as a mere writing-machine, a dull, mute, blind tool."

"I thought M. d'Aigrigny had more penetration?"

"And you think rightly, my dear young lady. He is a man of unexampled sagacity; but I deceived him by affecting more than simplicity. Do not on that account think me false. No! I am proud—yes, proud in my way; and my pride consists in never appearing above my situation, however subaltern it may be. Do you know why? Why, because then, however haughty my superiors may be, I say to myself, They do not know my value ; and then it is not myself, but the inferiority of my position, which they humiliate. By this I gain two things : my self-love is not offended, and I do not hate any body."

"Yes, I comprehend this sort of pride," said Adrienne, more and more struck with Rodin's original turn of mind.

"But let us return to what concerns you, my dear young lady. On the evening before the 13th of February, the Abbé d'Aigrigny brought me a paper written in short-hand. 'Write out this interrogatory, and add that this document comes to support the decision of the family discussion, which declares, according to the report of Dr. Baleinier, the state of mind of Mademoiselle de Cardoville to be so alarming, as to require her being shut up in a lunatic asylum.'"

"Yes," said Adrienne, with bitterness, "it was concerning a long conversation which I had with my aunt, Madame de Saint-Dizier, and which was written unknown to me."

"Well, I was alone with my short-hand memorial, and began to transcribe it. At the end of ten lines I became struck with astonishment. I did not know whether I was asleep or awake. 'What ! mad ?' I cried ; 'Mademoiselle de Cardoville mad ? Why, they are mad who dare to assert such a monstrous falsehood !' More and more interested, I continued my perusal ; and I completed it. Ah, then, what shall I say to you ? What I experienced then, my dear young lady, cannot be expressed. It was weakness—joy—enthusiasm !"

"Sir !" said Adrienne.

"Yes, my dear young lady—enthusiasm ! Do not let this word shock your modesty. Learn that those ideas, so new, so independent, so courageous, which you uttered with so much energy before your aunt, are, without your knowing it, precisely similar to those entertained by a person for whom you will one day feel the most religious respect."

"Of whom do you speak, sir ?" inquired Mademoiselle de Cardoville, more and more interested.

After a moment's apparent hesitation, Rodin replied :—

"No, no ; it is useless now to inform you. All I can say to you, my dear young lady, is this, my perusal finished, I ran to the Abbé d'Aigrigny in order to convince him of the mistake under which he laboured with respect to you. I could not meet with him ; but yesterday morning I told him, unreservedly, my opinion ; he appeared only astonished that I had any opinion at all ; a haughty silence was the manner in which all my arguments were treated. I believed his good faith was alarmed. I urged him, but in vain. He ordered me to follow him to the house where the will of your ancestor was to be opened. I was so blind with respect to the Abbé d'Aigrigny that, before my eyes could be opened, it required the successive arrivals of the soldier, his son, and then Marshal Simon's father. Their indignation unveiled to me the extent of a conspiracy, planned and carved out with consummate skill. Then I understood why they kept you here shut up as a lunatic ; then I understood why the daughters of Marshal Simon had been taken to the convent. Then, in fact, a thousand recollections crowded upon me : payments of letters, memoranda, which had been given to me to decipher or copy, and of which, until then, I had not divined the signification, then suddenly opened my eyes as to the object of this odious machination. To shew, sitting where I was, the sudden horror I felt at these infamies would be to lose all. This error I did not commit. I contended in cunning with the Abbé d'Aigrigny. I appeared even more avaricious than himself. If this immense inheritance had been about to become my own, I could not have evinced a more fierce and pitiless desire for the prey. Thanks to this stratagem, the Abbé d'Aigrigny had not the slightest suspicion. A providential chance having rescued the inheritance from his hands, he quitted the house in the utmost consternation ; I, in unutterable joy ; for I had now the means of saving, of avenging you, my dear young lady. Yesterday evening I went to my office as usual ; during the Abbé's absence I had time to peruse the whole correspondence relative to the inheritance, so that I can now gather up all the threads of this enormous conspiracy. Oh, then, my dear young lady ! before the discoveries I made, and which, but for this circumstance, I should never have thought of making, I remained aghast—thunderstruck !”

“What discoveries, sir ?”

“They are terrible secrets for those who possess them ; therefore do not insist on knowing, my dear young lady ; but in my scrutiny the league, formed by an insatiable cupidity against you and your parents, was laid bare before me in all its dark infamy. Then the deep and lively interest which I already felt for you and your relatives increased and extended itself to the other innocent victims of this infernal scheme. In spite of my weakness, I determined to risk all to unmask the Abbé d'Aigrigny, I collected the proofs requisite to give to my deposition before justice a sufficient authority, and this morning I left the house of the Abbé without telling him of my plans, as he might have had recourse to some violent means to detain me. Still it would have been base in me to attack him without warning. So, once out of his house, I wrote to him that I had in my hands such proofs of his unworthy conduct as would justify me in attacking him openly in the face of daylight. I would accuse him—let him defend himself. I then went to a magistrate, and you know ——”

At this moment the door opened, and one of the women-keepers appeared, who said to Rodin,—

“Sir, the messenger you and the judge sent to the Rue Brise-Miche has returned.”

“Has he left the letter ?”

“Yes, sir, which was sent up stairs instantly.”

“Very well, you may go.”

The keeper left the apartment.

CHAPTER XX.

SYMPATHY.

IF Mademoiselle de Cardoville had any suspicions remaining as to the sincerity of Rodin's devotion to her they must all have disappeared before arguments which, unfortunately, were so natural and irresistible. How was it possible to suspect the least concert between the Abbé d'Aigrigny and his secretary, when this latter, so completely unveiling the machinations of his master, exposed him before the tribunals? And besides, did not Rodin go farther even in this than Mademoiselle de Cardoville herself would have done? What secret plotting of the Jesuit could she suspect? Nothing, at most, beyond that of seeking to acquire, by his services, the profitable protection of this young lady. And then did he not protest against this supposition, by declaring that it was not to Mademoiselle de Cardoville, the lovely, noble, and rich, that he was devoted, but to the young girl, with the lofty and generous heart? And then, finally, as Rodin himself said, "What man, unless he were a wretch, but must be interested in the fate of Adrienne?"

A singular feeling, a remarkable mixture of curiosity, suspense, and interest, united with Mademoiselle de Cardoville's gratitude towards Rodin; still, recognising beneath this lowly exterior a very superior mind, a grave suspicion came suddenly over her mind.

"Sir," she said to Rodin, "I always tell persons whom I esteem openly of the unpleasant doubts with which they inspire me, in order that they may justify themselves and excuse me, if I am deceived."

Rodin looked at Mademoiselle de Cardoville with surprise, and appeared mentally to con over the suspicions he could have inspired, and, after a moment's silence, replied,—

"Perhaps you refer to my journey to Cardoville, and my shameful propositions to your good and worthy land-steward? I ——"

"No, no, sir," said Adrienne, interrupting him; "you made this confession to me spontaneously; and, understand that, blinded as to M. d'Aigrigny's character, you have passively executed instructions at which your mind revolted. But how is it that, with your unquestionable abilities, you occupied under him, and for so long a time, so very humble a position?"

"True," said Rodin, smiling; "that must surprise you very much; and to my discredit, my dear young lady, for a man of my capacity who remains for a long time in an humble post has evidently some radical vice—some low and degrading passion."

"It is, sir, generally true."

"And personally true, as far as I am concerned."

"What, sir! do you avow this?"

"Alas! I avow that I have a bad quality, to which, for forty years, I have sacrificed every prospect of attaining a suitable position."

"And this quality, sir?"

"Since I must make the degrading confession to you—it is idleness—yes, idleness ; a horror of all activity of mind, of all moral responsibility, of all commencement of any thing. With the twelve hundred francs (48*l.*) which the Abbé d'Aigrigny gave me, I was the happiest man in the world. I had faith in the nobleness of his views ; his thought was mine—his will was mine ; my work done, I returned to my little chamber, lighted my fire, dined off vegetables ; and then taking up some little-known philosophical work, and dreaming over it, I gave full freedom to my mind, which, restrained all day, now carried me through the most delicious theories and utopianisms. Then, from the elevation of my exalted feeling, exalted by the boldness of my thoughts, I seemed to rule over my master and the greatest geniuses of the earth. This fever lasted, ma foi ! some three or four hours, after which I slept like a tired man, and every morning I went cheerfully to my work. Sure of my next day's bread, careless for the future, living on little, awaiting impatiently the joys of my solitary evening, and saying to myself, whilst I scribbled away like a stupid machine, Eh—eh ! still, if I were so inclined ——”

“ Assuredly, you might as well as another, better than many others, have attained a high position,” said Adrienne, singularly affected by the practical philosophy of Rodin.

“ Yes, I believe I might have attained it ; but, if I had, what good was it ? You see, my dear young lady, what often renders people of a certain merit inexplicable to the million is, that they so frequently content themselves with saying, If I liked !”

“ But then, sir, without caring much for the luxuries of life, there is a certain attainment of comfort which age renders almost indispensable, but which you entirely renounce.”

“ Undeceive yourself, I beg, my dear young lady,” said Rodin, smiling craftily ; “ I am a real Sybarite ; I must have a good garment, a good fire, a good mattrass, a good piece of bread, a good radish, well flavoured with the best grey salt, good clear water ; and still, despite this complication of my tastes, my twelve hundred francs are more than enough, and I really save—something.”

“ And, now you are out of employ, how do you propose to live, sir ?” asked Adrienne, more and more interested in the eccentricity of this man, and desirous of putting his disinterestedness to the test.

“ I have by me a small purse, which has in it sufficient to maintain me here until the last knot in Père d'Aigrigny's black plot be unravelled. I owe myself this reparation for having been his dupe. Three or four days will be enough, I hope, for this work. After that, I am certain to procure some humble appointment in your province with a collector there. It is not long since that a person who took an interest in me offered me this, but then I was unwilling to leave Père d'Aigrigny, in spite of the great advantages which this proposition opened to me. Only imagine, my dear young lady, eight hundred francs (32*l.*) ; yes, eight hundred francs, board and lodging. As I am rather surly, I should have preferred living by myself ; but, you know, as I should have had so much, I must have put up with this small inconvenience.”

We cannot attempt to delineate Rodin's ingenuity in making these little household confidences, so grossly lying as they were, to Mademoiselle de Cardoville, whose last suspicion disappeared before them.

"What, sir!" she said to the Jesuit, in a tone of interest, "do you leave Paris in three or four days?"

"I hope so, my dear young lady, and for many reasons," he said, in a mysterious tone; "but it will be very precious to me;" he went on in a serious and earnest air, looking tenderly at Adrienne — "nay, precious to carry away with me, at least, the conviction that you felt kindly towards me for having only, in the perusal of your conversation with the Princess de Saint-Dizier, appreciated in you a height of character unequalled in our days in a young person of your age and condition."

"Ah, sir," said Adrienne, with a smile, "do not suppose that you are bound so speedily to return to me the sincere praises which I have bestowed on your superiority of mind. I should infinitely prefer ingratitude."

"Oh, I do not flatter you, my dear young lady—what good would that be? We shall not be likely to meet again; no, no, I do not flatter you—I comprehend you, that's all; and what may seem odd to you is, that your appearance confirms the idea I had formed of you, my dear young lady, in reading your interview with your aunt; and some points in your character which, until then, were obscure to me, are now perfectly cleared up."

"Really, sir, you astonish me more and more."

"Why, really, I tell you my impressions, as I experienced them, and I perfectly explain to myself now, for instance, your adoration of the beautiful, your religious worship of things which appertain to the utmost refinement of the senses, your ardent aspirations towards a better world, your bold contempt for many degrading and servile customs to which women are subjected: yes, now I comprehend fully the noble pride with which you contemplate the crowd of vain, conceited, and absurd men, for whom woman is but a creature belonging to them, by the laws which they have made, after their own image, which is by no means handsome. According to these tyrants, woman, an inferior being, whose soul a council of cardinals deigned to recognise, by a majority of two, ought to consider herself a thousand times too happy to be the slave of these petty pachas who, old at thirty, worn-out, blasés, and wearied of every excess, desirous of repose in their exhaustion, think, as they term it, of coming to an end, which they illustrate by marrying a poor young girl who, for her part, is desirous, on the contrary, to make a beginning."

Mademoiselle de Cardoville would certainly have smiled at the satiric descriptions of Rodin, if she had not been singularly struck by hearing him express himself in terms so appropriate to her own ideas. When, for the first time in her life, she saw this dangerous man, Adrienne forgot, or, rather, did not know that she had encountered a Jesuit of wonderful mind; and that this class unites with marvellous knowledge the resources of the police spy, and the deep-sealed sagacity of a confessor; diabolic priests who, by means of certain information, some statements, and some letters, can construct a character as Cuvier reconstructed a body from certain zoological fragments.

Adrienne, far from interrupting Rodin, listened with increasing curiosity.

Sure of the effect he produced, Rodin continued, in an indignant tone,—

“And your aunt and the Abbé d’Aigrigny treated you as a lunatic because you revolted against the future yoke of such bashaws,—because, in hatred of the disgraceful vices of slavery, you desired to be independent, with the loyal qualities which are inherent to independence; for with the broad virtues of freedom ——”

“But, sir,” said Adrienne, more and more surprised, “how could my thoughts be thus familiar to you?”

“In the first place, I knew you perfectly, thanks to your conversation with Madame de Saint-Dizier; and then, if by chance we should be both pursuing the same end, though by different means,” added Rodin, with intense cunning, and looking at Mademoiselle de Cardoville with an air of meaning, “why should not our conviction be the same?”

“I do not understand you, sir; to what end do you allude?”

“The end which all noble, generous, and independent minds incessantly pursue; some acting like you, my dear young lady, from feeling and instinct, without reference, perhaps, to the high destiny which they are called upon to fulfil. Thus, for instance, when you were in the midst of the most refined enjoyments, when you were surrounded by all that most enthrals and delights the senses, do you believe that you only yielded to a love of the beautiful, to the desire of exquisite enjoyment? No, no,—a thousand times no; for then you would only have been an imperfect and personally odious creature,—a mere egotist of refined taste, and nothing more; and that, at your age, would have been frightful, my dear young lady,—positively frightful.”

“Do you, sir, pronounce this severe judgment on me?” asked Adrienne, with uneasiness; so much did this man impose upon her in spite of herself.

“Certainly I should pronounce it against you if you loved luxury for luxury’s sake: but no, no, a very different sentiment animates you,” added the Jesuit; “so let us reason together a little. Experiencing the passionate desire of all these enjoyments, you feel their value or their want more acutely than any other person. Is it not true?”

“It is, sir,” replied Adrienne, greatly interested.

“Your gratitude and your interest, then, are already compulsorily bestowed on those who poor, laborious, and unknown, procure for you those wonders of luxury which you cannot do without?”

“My feeling of gratitude is so great, sir,” answered Adrienne, more and more over-joyed to find herself so well understood or divined, “that one day I had inscribed in a chef-d’œuvre of gold plate, instead of the name of the seller, the name of the maker, a poor artist, until then unknown, and who subsequently obtained the reputation he merited.”

“I see I was not mistaken,” said Rodin; “the love of these enjoyments renders you grateful to those who procure them for you; and that is not all. Look at me, for instance, neither better nor worse than my fellows, but accustomed to lead a life of privations, which are of no consequence in the world to me. Well, the privations of my neighbour touch me consequently much less than they do you, my dear young lady; for your habits of living render you, of necessity, more compassionate for misery and misfortune than any other person. You would suffer too much for that misery, and would pity and succour those who are suffering."

"Indeed, sir," said Adrienne, who began to find herself under the fatal spell of Rodin; "the more I hear you, the more I am convinced that you define a thousand times better than I did those ideas which have brought upon me so heavily the reproaches of Madame de Saint-Dizier and the Abbé d'Aigrigny. Oh, speak!—speak, sir! I cannot tell you with what delight—what pride I listen to you."

And attentive, excited, her eyes fastened on the Jesuit with as much interest as sympathy and curiosity, Adrienne, by a graceful movement of the head, which was familiar to her, threw back her long curls of her golden hair, as if better to gaze on Rodin, who replied,—

"And you are astonished, my dear young lady, at not having been understood by your aunt and the Abbé d'Aigrigny? But what have you in common with these hypocritical, jealous, plotting spirits, such as I now know them to be? Will you have another proof of their hateful blindness? Among what they styled your monstrous follies, which was the most wicked, the most damnable? Why, it was your resolution to live henceforth alone, and as you pleased, to dispose freely of your present and your future; they found that odious, detestable, immoral. And yet was your resolution dictated by a foolish love of liberty? No. By an ill-regulated aversion from all restraint and direction? No. By the sole desire of making yourself singular? No! for then I should have blamed you severely."

"In truth, other reasons actuated me, sir, I assure you," said Adrienne eagerly, and becoming very jealous of the esteem which her character had inspired Rodin withal.

"Eh! I know that well enough, your motives were and could but be most excellent," continued the Jesuit. "Wherefore did you take a resolution so warmly assailed? Was it to brave established usages? No; you respected them so long as the hatred of Madame de Saint-Dizier did not force you to withdraw yourself from her harsh guardianship. Were you desirous to live alone in order to avoid the eyes of the world? No; for you would be a hundred times more in view in this singular way of life than in any other. Were you, in truth, desirous of employing your liberty badly? No,—a thousand times no! to do ill, people seek the shade—isolation: placed, on the contrary, as you will be, all the jealous and envious eyes of the vulgar herd will be constantly directed towards you. Why, therefore, did you take so bold and so unusual a determination, and so remarkable in a young person of your age? Shall I tell you, my dear young lady? Well, then, you were desirous of proving, in your own person, that every female, with purity of heart, right principles, firm character, and independent conduct, may nobly and proudly leave that humiliating tutelage which custom imposes on her! Yes, instead of leading the life of a slave in revolt, a life fatally devoted to hypocrisy or vice, you would live in the sight of all frank, independent, and respected. In fine, you wish to have, like man, a free will, entire responsibility in all acts of life, in order to prove indubitably that a woman completely left to herself can equal a man in reason, in wisdom, in correctness, and surpass him in delicacy and dignity. This was your intention, my dear young lady. Your example is noble, it is grand; will it be imitated? I hope so! But your noble attempt will always place you high and loftily, believe me."

The eyes of mademoiselle shone with proud and soft brilliancy, her cheeks were slightly flushed, her bosom palpitated, and she raised her beautiful head with a gesture of involuntary pride; and, at length, completely under the charm of this diabolical man, she cried,—

"But, sir, who are you, then, to know—to analyse thus my secret thoughts, to read in my soul more clearly than I read myself, to give a new life, a fresh incentive to those ideas of independence which have so long germed in my bosom? Who are you, indeed, who make me seem so strong in my own eyes, that now I feel a consciousness that I may accomplish a mission honourable to myself, and perhaps useful to those of my sisters, who suffer a hard servitude. Once more, sir, who are you?"

"Who am I, mademoiselle?" answered Rodin, with a smile replete with philanthropy. "I have already told you that I am a poor old fellow, who for forty years, after having every day served as a machine to write down the ideas of others, returns each evening into his retreat, where he permits himself to indulge in his own lucubrations—a good fellow, who from his garret assists, and even takes a small part in the movement of five spirits who are marching onwards towards an end more near, perhaps, than some suppose. Thus, my dear young lady, as I told you just now, you and I tend to the same ends. You without thinking it, and in continuing to obey your rare and divine instincts. So believe me, live, live always charming, always free, always happy! that is your mission; it is more full of providence than you may suppose. Yes, continue to surround yourself with every luxury of art and refinement. Refine still your senses, still purify your tastes by the exquisite selection of your enjoyments. Reign by mind, by grace, by purity, over the weak and hideous flock of men, who from to-morrow, seeing you free and alone, will come and buzz around you. They will think you an easy prey, within the reach of their cupidity, their egotism, their contemptible weakness. Rail at and stigmatise their absurd and sordid pretensions. Be queen of this world, and be worthy to be respected as a queen. Love, shine, enjoy, that is your part here below: do not doubt that! All those flowers which Heaven has shed on you so abundantly will one day bear fruits ripe and plentiful. You will be supposed to live only for pleasure, whilst, in fact, you will have lived for the most noble end to which a great and beautiful mind can devote itself. Then, perhaps, some years hence we may meet again, you still more lovely and beloved, I still more old and obscure; but no matter, a secret voice now says to you, I am certain, that between us two so dissimilar there is a secret link, a mysterious communion which henceforth nothing can destroy."

As he pronounced these last words with an accent so deeply full of emotion that Adrienne trembled, Rodin imperceptibly drew nearer to her, as it were, without walking, but by dragging his feet along, and gliding over the floor by a sort of slow motion like that of a reptile; he had spoken with so much energy, so much warmth, that his pale face was slightly flushed, and his repulsive ugliness almost disappeared before the sparkling glances of his small yellow eyes, then fully opened, round, and staring, and which he fastened steadfastly on Adrienne, who, with her lips half open, and her breathing oppressed, could not take her gaze from off the Jesuit. He ceased speaking, but she listened still. What this lovely, elegant girl experienced at the sight of this little, miserable, dirty, ugly, old man, was inexplicable. The comparison, so vulgar, yet so true, of the fearful fascination of the serpent over the bird, may, however, give some idea of this strange impression. Rodin's tactic was skilful and sure.

Up to this time Mademoiselle de Cardoville had not reasoned either on her tastes or her instincts, but had given herself up to them because they were harmless and delightful. How happy and proud, then, must she be to hear a man endowed with a superior mind, not only praise her inclinations for what she had formerly been so bitterly blamed, but congratulated her upon them as noble and divine.

If Rodin had only addressed himself to Adrienne's self-love, he would have been caught in his own perfidious snare, for she had not the slightest vanity; but he addressed himself to all that was most elevated and noble in the heart of this young creature, and what he appeared to encourage and admire in her was really worthy of encouragement and admiration. How was it possible for her to escape language which concealed such dark and malicious plans?

Struck by the singular intelligence of the Jesuit, feeling her curiosity greatly excited by some mysterious words which he had designedly let drop, not explaining even to herself the singular power which this pernicious man already exercised over her mind, feeling a respectful compassion when she recollected that a man of that age and understanding was in a most precarious position, Adrienne said to him, with her natural cordiality, —

“A man of your merit and your heart, sir, ought not to be at the mercy of circumstances. Some of your words have opened fresh horizons to me. I feel that in many points your advice will be very useful to me in future; in fact, in coming to rescue me from this house, in devoting yourself to other persons of my family, you have testified an interest in me that I cannot forget without ingratitude. A position very humble but certain has been taken from you. Allow me to——”

“Not another word, my dear young lady,” said Rodin, interrupting Mademoiselle de Cardoville with an air of vexation. “I feel the deepest sympathy towards you. I honour myself for having ideas in common with your own; in fact, I firmly believe that some day you will have to ask advice of the poor old philosopher! in consequence of that I ought to maintain with respect to you the most perfect independence.”

“But, sir, it is on the contrary I who shall be obliged if you will accept what I desire so earnestly to offer you.”

"Oh, my dear young lady," said Rodin, smiling, "I knew your generosity would always make the debt light and easy; but once again, I cannot accept any thing from you. One day, perhaps you will know why."

"One day?"

"It is impossible for me to say more. And then supposing that I owe you any obligation, how would I then tell you of all there is in you that is good and beautiful? Hereafter, if you owe me much for my advice, so much the better; I shall only be the more at my ease to blame you if I find cause to blame."

"But then, sir, gratitude towards you is forbidden."

"No, no," said Rodin, with apparent emotion. "Oh, believe me, there will come a solemn moment when you will be able to acquit yourself in a manner equally worthy of yourself and me."

The conversation was interrupted by the keeper, who came in and said to Adrienne,—

"Mademoiselle, there is down below a little hump-backed work-girl who wants to speak with you. According to the fresh orders of the doctor you are at liberty to receive whomever you please; so I have come to ask if I shall let her come up. She is so badly dressed that I did not dare."

"Bring her up directly," said Adrienne, quickly recognising La Mayeux by the keeper's description: "immediately!"

"The doctor has also given orders to have his carriage placed at your command. Shall I desire the coachman to harness the horses?"

"Yes, in a quarter of an hour," replied Adrienne; and the woman quitted the apartment. Then turning to Rodin,—

"The magistrate will not be long now before he returns with Marshal Simon's daughters, I should think?"

"I should think not, my dear young lady. But who is this young deformed work-girl?" asked Rodin, with an air of indifference.

"She is the adopted sister of a worthy artisan, who risked all to snatch me from this abode, sir!" replied Adrienne, with emotion. "This young work-girl is a rare and excellent creature. Never was a mind more exalted, a heart more generous, hidden beneath an exterior less——"

Pausing when she thought of Rodin, who seemed to her nearly to unite the same physical and moral contrasts as La Mayeux, Adrienne added, looking with inimitable grace at the Jesuit, who was astonished at her sudden silence,—

"No; this noble girl is not the only person who proves how real nobility of soul, how superiority of mind, may render indifferent the vain advantage due only to chance or wealth!"

At the moment Adrienne uttered these last words, La Mayeux entered the apartment.

CHAPTER XXI.

MISTRUST.

MADemoiselle DE CARDVILLE advanced rapidly towards La Mayeux, and, extending her arms, said to her, in a voice filled with emotion,—

“Come, come—there is now no grating to separate us!”

At this allusion, which recalled to her that before her poor and toiling hand had been respectfully kissed by this beautiful and rich patrician, the young work-girl experienced a sensation of gratitude at once indescribable and proud. But, as she hesitated to reply to her cordial reception, Adrienne embraced her with touching earnestness.

When La Mayeux saw herself encircled in the lovely arms of Mademoiselle de Cardville, and felt the fresh and rosy lips of the young lady applied with sisterly affection on her pale and wan cheeks, she burst into tears, wholly unable to utter a word.

Rodin, who had retreated into a corner, contemplated this scene with secret uneasiness. Aware of the refusal, full of dignity, which La Mayeux had given to the perfidious temptations of the superior of the Convent of Sainte-Marie—well aware of the deep devotion of this generous creature for Agricola, a devotion which had testified itself so boldly with regard to Mademoiselle de Cardville a few days previously—the Jesuit did not like to see Adrienne thus display her desire to increase this regard. He thought wisely, that we should never disdain an enemy or a friend, how small soever they may be. And his enemy was any one who devoted herself to Mademoiselle de Cardville; and then, we well know, that Rodin united to a marvellous firmness of character certain superstitious weaknesses; and he felt uneasy at the singular impression of fear with which La Mayeux inspired him; and he determined to remember this presentiment or this foresight.

Delicate minds have always in the smallest things nice and graceful instincts. Thus, after La Mayeux had shed many and sweet tears of gratitude, Adrienne, taking a richly embroidered handkerchief, wiped away with gentle hand the moist evidences which inundated the melancholy face of the young work-girl.

This action, so spontaneously kind, saved La Mayeux from humiliation; for, alas! humiliation and suffering are the two abysses which are for ever on each side of the unfortunate! And thus for misfortune, the least delicate attention is almost invariably a double obligation!

Perhaps a smile of disdain may attend the instance we are about to deduce ; but the poor Mayeux, not daring to draw from her pocket her old ragged handkerchief, would have remained long blinded by her tears if Mademoiselle de Cardoville had not come to her assistance.

"You are so good! Ah, you are so noble and charitable, mademoiselle!"

This was all that the work-girl could say, in a deeply affected voice, and touched to the heart by the attention of Mademoiselle de Cardoville—more so, perhaps, than she would have been for any actual service done for her.

"Look there, sir!" said Adrienne to Rodin, who came quickly towards her. "Yes," added the young patrician, with pride, "here is a treasure I have discovered. Look, sir, and love her as I love her—honour her as I honour her. Here is one of those hearts which we are seeking for."

"And which we find, Dieu merci!" said Rodin to Adrienne, and bowing to the work-girl.

La Mayeux raised her eyes slowly towards the Jesuit, and—strange!—at the sight of that cadaverous countenance which smiled benignantly on her, the young girl shuddered. She had never before seen this man, yet she instantly felt for him almost the same impression of fear and dislike which he had just experienced towards her. Usually timid and embarrassed, La Mayeux could not take her eyes off Rodin. Her heart palpitated violently, as if some great danger was about to beset her. And as the worthy creature only feared for those whom she loved, she drew nigh to Adrienne involuntarily, still keeping her eyes fixed on Rodin.

He was too keen a physiognomist not to perceive the disagreeable impression which he had made, and felt his instinctive aversion against the work-girl increase.

Instead of lowering his eyes before her, he appeared to scrutinise her with an attention so sustained, that Mademoiselle de Cardoville was greatly surprised.

"Pardon, my dear young girl," said Rodin, with the air of trying to collect his thoughts, and addressing La Mayeux, "pardon me, but I think I am not deceived! Did you not go a few days since to the Convent of Sainte-Marie, close by?"

"Yes, sir."

"Ah, I thought so—it is you! What was I thinking of?" he exclaimed. "It was you! I ought not to have had a doubt on the point."

"What are you alluding to, sir?" inquired Adrienne.

"Ah, you are right, my dear young lady," said Rodin, pointing to La Mayeux. "There is a heart—such a noble one as we are seeking. If you knew with what dignity, with what courage, this poor child, who was out of work—and for her to want work is to want every thing—if you knew, I say, with what dignity she repulsed the degrading wages which the superior of the convent had the indignity to offer to her on condition of undertaking to play the spy in the family where she proposed to place her!"

"Oh, it is infamous!" exclaimed Mademoiselle de Cardoville, with disgust. "Such a proposition to this poor child—to her!"

"Mademoiselle," said La Mayeux, bitterly, "I had no work—I was poor. They did not know me—they thought they might propose any thing to me."

"I say," said Rodin, "that it was a two-fold indignity on the part of the superior to tempt misery, and that it was doubly great for you to have refused."

"Sir!" said La Mayeux, with modest embarrassment.

"Oh! oh!—no one intimidates me!" continued Rodin. "Praise or blame, I say bluntly what comes into my thoughts. Ask this dear young lady!" and he pointed to Adrienne. "I will, therefore, tell you openly, that I think as much and as highly of you as Mademoiselle de Cardoville herself does."

"Believe me, my dear girl," said Adrienne, "there are praises which honour, recompense, and encourage; and those of M. Rodin are amongst the number. I know it—oh yes, I know it!"

"But, my dear young lady, you must not cast on me all the honour of this opinion!"

"What mean you, sir?"

"Is not this dear girl the adopted sister of Agricola Baudoin, the brave artisan, the energetic and popular poet? Well, is not the regard of such a man the best guarantee in the world, and gives us a better assurance than judging by the mere label—if I may use such an expression," added Rodin, with a smile.

"You are right, sir!" said Adrienne. "For, without knowing this dear girl, I began to interest myself deeply in her lot, from the day when her adopted brother spoke to me of her. He expressed himself with so much warmth and strong feeling, that I at once esteemed a young girl capable of inspiring so noble an attachment."

These words of Adrienne, combined with another circumstance, affected La Mayeux so powerfully, that her wan countenance became purple.

We know that the poor girl loved Agricola with an ardour as passionate as it was painful and hidden; and any allusion, however indirect, to this fatal sentiment, caused cruel embarrassment to the young creature.

And at the moment when Mademoiselle de Cardoville had spoken of Agricola's attachment for her, La Mayeux had met the keen and penetrating glance of Rodin fastened on her. Alone with Adrienne, the young work-girl, on hearing the smith's name mentioned, would only have experienced a passing emotion; but it seemed to her that the Jesuit, who, unfortunately, had already inspired her with involuntary alarm, read in her heart, and surprised in it, the secret of the fatal love of which she was the victim. Thence the deep blush of the poor girl, her visible and painful embarrassment, which had struck Adrienne.

A mind as subtle and quick as Rodin's always seeks the cause of the smallest effect; and, putting various circumstances together, saw on the one side a deformed but remarkably intelligent girl, capable of intense devotion, and, on the other, a young artisan, handsome, bold, sensible, and open-hearted. "Brought up together, and sympathising with each other on very many points, they must have the affection of brother and sister," he thought; "but a sisterly love does not cause a blush in the cheek. Can she really be in love with Agricola?"

On the highroad to this discovery, Rodin was desirous to push his investigation to the end; and remarking the surprise which the visible trouble of La Mayeux caused to Adrienne, he said to the latter, smiling and looking significantly towards La Mayeux,—

"Ha! you see, my dear young lady, how she blushes, poor dear! when one alludes to the strong attachment of this worthy artisan for her!"

La Mayeux stooped her head, overwhelmed with confusion.

After a moment's pause, during which Rodin kept silence, in order to give his malignant shaft time to penetrate deeply into the heart of the poor girl, the executioner resumed,—

"You see, my dear young lady, how it affects her!"

Then, after another pause, perceiving that La Mayeux changed from scarlet to a ghastly paleness, and trembled in every limb, the Jesuit feared he had gone too far, for Adrienne said to La Mayeux, with interest,—

"My dear girl, why are you thus agitated?"

"It is plain enough," replied Rodin, with the utmost simplicity, for, knowing what he wished to ascertain, he seemed not to suspect any thing. "It is quite plain this dear girl has the modesty of a good and tender sister for her brother. By loving him, by assimilating herself with him, where he is praised, it appears to her as though she were praised herself."

"And as she is as modest as she is excellent," added Adrienne, taking La Mayeux's hands, "the smallest praise either of her adopted brother or herself troubles her, as we have seen, in what is really childish, for which I shall scold her as she deserves."

Mademoiselle de Cardoville spoke earnestly, for the explanation which Rodin had given seemed to her really very plausible.

Like all persons who, fearing every moment to have their painful secret discovered, and who become assured as quickly as they become alarmed, La Mayeux persuaded herself—she was compelled to do so that she might not sink from shame—that the last words of Rodin were sincere, and that he did not suspect the love she had for Agricola. Then her agony diminished, and she found a few words to say to Mademoiselle de Cardoville.

"Excuse me, mademoiselle," she said, timidly, "I am so little accustomed to such kindness as yours, that I make but a bad return for your goodness to me."

"My goodness, my poor girl!" answered Adrienne; "I have done nothing for you yet. But, thank God! from to-day I may keep my promise, and recompense your devotion to me, your courageous resignation, your worthy love of work, and the noble disposition, of which you have given so many proofs in the midst of the most cruel trials and visitations. In a word, from this day forth, if you like, we will not part from each other."

"Mademoiselle, you are too good," said La Mayeux, in a trembling voice; "but I——"

"Oh, take courage," said Adrienne, interrupting her, as guessing her reply. "If you will accept my offer, I shall be able to reconcile with my somewhat egotistical desire to have you constantly with me the independence of your disposition, your habits of occupation, your love of retirement, and your desire to devote yourself to all that deserves commiseration. And, even, I will not conceal from you, it is by giving you the means of satisfying your generous inclinations, that I rely on seducing you, and fixing you with me."

"But what have I done, mademoiselle," said La Mayeux, with simplicity, "to deserve so much gratitude on your part? Is it not you, on the contrary, who began by shewing yourself so generous towards my adopted brother?"

"Oh, I do not speak to you of gratitude," said Adrienne; "we are quits. But I speak to you of affection and the sincere friendship which I offer to you."

"Friendship!—for me, mademoiselle?"

"Come, come," said Adrienne, with a lovely smile, "do not be proud because you have the advantage of the position. And besides, I have taken it into my head that you will be my friend; and you will see this will be so. But now I think of it—it is rather late, to be sure—but what lucky chance brings you here?"

"This morning M. Dagobert received a letter, in which he was requested to come here, where, as it said, he would have good news relative to that which was most interesting to him of any thing in the world. Believing that it concerned the Mesdemoiselles Simon, he said to me, 'La Mayeux, you have taken so much interest in what concerns my dear children, that it is necessary that you should come with me. You will see my joy at finding them, and that will be your reward.'"

Adrienne looked at Rodin, who made an affirmative sign with his head, and said,—

"Yes, yes, my dear young lady; it was I who wrote to the brave soldier, but without signing or explaining myself any further. You know why!"

"How is it then, my dear girl, that you have come here alone?"

"Alas, mademoiselle, I was, when I came, so overcome by your reception of me, that I could not tell you all my fears."

"What fears?" asked Rodin.

"Knowing that you were here, mademoiselle, I supposed that it was you who had sent this letter to M. Dagobert. I told him so, and he was of the same opinion as myself. When we arrived here, his impatience was so great, that he inquired at the door if the young orphan ladies were in this house, and he described them. They told him 'No;' that they were not here. Then, in spite of my entreaties, he would go to the convent to inquire after them."

"What imprudence!" exclaimed Adrienne.

"After what took place the other night!" added Rodin, shrugging up his shoulders.

"It was in vain that I told him," continued La Mayeux, "that the letter did not positively announce that the orphans would be given up to him, but that he would get some particulars about them: he would not listen to me, and told me, if I learn nothing, I will come back to you here: but they were in the convent the day before yesterday, and now that all is discovered, they cannot refuse them to me."

"And with such a head," said Rodin, with a smile, "all discussion is useless."

"Indeed! I trust he will not be recognised!" said Adrienne, reflecting on Dr. Baleinier's threats.

"That is not likely," said Rodin, "for they would not allow him to enter the door. That I hope will be the greatest trial he will have; and the magistrate cannot now be long before he returns with the young ladies. I am not wanted here any longer, and other cares call me hence. I must search for Prince Djalma; so be so kind as to inform me when and where I may see you, my dear young lady, in order that I may from time to time inform you of the result of my researches, and to agree upon all that concerns the young prince, if, as I hope, those researches will have good results."

"You will find me in my new abode, whither I propose going upon quitting this place; it is situated in the Rue d'Anjou, and is known as the Hôtel de Beaulieu. But," added Adrienne, after reflecting for several minutes, "upon further consideration, it does not appear to me either correct, or, indeed, for several reasons, scarcely prudent, to allow Prince Djalma to occupy the pavilion in which I used to reside in the Hôtel de Saint-Dizier. A short time since, I saw a charming little residence, elegantly furnished, and ready for immediate occupation. A few tasteful embellishments, which might be effected in twenty-four hours, would render it a delightful abode. Yes, yes, that will be a thousand times better," continued M. de Cardoville, after a fresh silence, "and the more so, as it will enable me to preserve a more strict incognito on the subject."

"Do I understand then," said Rodin, whose schemes were dangerously threatened by this new resolution on the part of Mademoiselle de Cardoville, "that it is your desire the prince should be kept in ignorance,—in perfect unconsciousness of the hand which has been extended to serve him?"

"I not only desire that my name be concealed from him, but that he be kept in absolute ignorance that such a person as myself is in existence—at least for the present. Hereafter—probably in a month's time—I may see cause to change my plan; but I must be entirely guided by circumstances."

"But," said Rodin, concealing by a mighty effort the extreme disappointment he experienced, "will it not be difficult, not to say impossible, to preserve the secret of your beneficence?"

"Had the prince inhabited my pavilion, as I originally intended, I should have had my fears on the subject; his being so completely in the vicinity of my aunt must have enlightened him on the subject of his mysterious friend; and the dread of that is one of my chief reasons for altering my first intentions; but the prince will now be situated in a distant neighbourhood, the Rue Blanche. Who will inform him of that which I am desirous of concealing from him? One of my oldest friends, M. Nerval, yourself, and this good girl"—pointing to La Mayeux—"on whose discretion I rely equally with your own, are the only depositories of my secret, which I fear not will be carefully kept. To-morrow we will discuss this subject at greater length. The more important affair now is, that you should be successful in discovering the present abode of this unfortunate young prince."

However wrathful and provoked at the sudden determination taken by Adrienne with respect to Djalma, Rodin constrained himself sufficiently to listen with affected calmness and to reply,—

"My dear young lady, your wishes shall be strictly attended to; and to-morrow, with your permission, I will wait upon you to give an account of what but just now you were pleased to style my providential mission."

"To-morrow, then, I shall expect you with impatience," said Adrienne, in a kind and almost affectionate tone; "promise me your further kind assistance, and allow me to reckon upon your friendship, as you may henceforward depend on mine. You will require a considerable share of indulgence to bear with the many proofs to which I shall put your kindness, for I perceive continual necessity for requesting your advice and valuable assistance; and that I shall have to largely increase my present heavy debt of gratitude to you."

"Oh, my dear young lady, my only regret is, that as yet you owe me so little,—so very little," said Rodin, proceeding slowly towards the door, after a profound bow as he passed Adrienne.

Just as he was issuing forth, he encountered Dagobert.

"Ha! ha!" exclaimed the soldier, seizing the Jesuit by the collar with a vigorous grasp, "here is one of them: at length, then, I have got one of the party."

CHAPTER XXII.

EXPLANATIONS.

MADemoiselle DE CARDOVILLE on seeing Dagobert seize Rodin so rudely by the collar, cried out in alarm, and advanced several paces towards the soldier.

"In heaven's name, sir, what are you doing?"

"What am I doing?" replied the soldier sternly, and without releasing his hold of Rodin, whilst he turned his head towards Adrienne, whom he did not know. "I profit by the occasion to throttle one of the wretches of that renegade's gang, until he will tell me where my poor children are."

"You are choking me!" said the Jesuit, with a half-strangled voice, and endeavouring to release himself from the old soldier's clutch.

"Where are the orphans, since they are not here, and they shut the door of the convent in my face without giving me any reply?" exclaimed Dagobert, in a voice of thunder.

"Help!" murmured Rodin.

"It is frightful!" exclaimed Adrienne; and pale and trembling she addressed Dagobert, with her hands clasped, and saying, "Mercy, sir! hear me! hear me!"

THE SEIZURE.

"M. Dagobert," cried La Mayeux, seizing the arm of Dagobert with her weak hands, and pointing to Adrienne, "she is Mademoiselle de Cardoville! what violence you are using in her presence,—and you must, no doubt, be mistaken."

At the name of Mademoiselle de Cardoville, the benefactress of his son, the soldier turned round quickly, and let go his grip of Rodin, who, purple in the face from rage and suffocation, adjusted his collar and cravat with great haste.

"Pardon me, mademoiselle!" said Dagobert, going towards Adrienne, still pale with fright; "I did not know who you were, but my first impulse carried me away in spite of myself."

"But what cause of anger has this gentleman ever given you?" asked Adrienne; "if you had listened to me you would know——"

"Excuse me if I interrupt you, mademoiselle!" said the soldier, repressing his ire. Then turning to Rodin, who had reassumed his calmness, "Thank the lady, and be off with you! if you stay here I will not answer for myself."

"One word only, my dear sir," said Rodin; "I——"

"I tell you I will not answer for myself if you remain here!" cried Dagobert, stamping his foot.

"But, in the name of heaven, tell me the cause of this anger," said Adrienne; "and, above all, be not deceived by appearances, but calm yourself and listen."

"Yes I am calm, mademoiselle," exclaimed Dagobert, with despair in his accents; "but I can only think of one thing, mademoiselle, and that is the arrival of Marshal Simon, who will be in Paris to-day or to-morrow."

"Can it be possible?" said Adrienne.

Rodin made a movement of surprise and joy.

"Yesterday evening," said Dagobert, "I received a letter from the Marshal, who has landed at Havre. For the last three days I have tried in every way, hoping again to have the orphans restored to me, since the machinations of these have failed (and he pointed to Rodin with a fresh burst of anger)—but no, they are plotting some fresh infamy—nothing is too atrocious for them!"

"But, sir," said Rodin, advancing towards him, "permit me to——"

"Leave the room!" cried Dagobert, whose irritation and anxiety redoubled when he remembered that from one moment to another Marshal Simon might arrive in Paris. "Go, I say! for if it were not for mademoiselle, I should at least have my revenge on one of you."

Rodin made a sign to Adrienne, to whose side he quietly approached, pointed to Dagobert with a gesture of pity, and said to him,—

"I will go, sir; and the more willingly that I was quitting the apartment when you came into it."

Then going close up to Mademoiselle de Cardoville, the Jesuit said in a low voice,—

"Poor soldier! grief distracts his brain, and he will not hear me. Explain all to him, my dear young lady; he will be convinced then," he added, with a significant air. "But in the meantime," he continued, whilst rummaging in the side pocket of his great-coat, and drawing out a small packet, "give him this, I beg of you, my dear young lady; this is my vengeance, and it will be sufficient for me."

And as Adrienne, taking the small packet in her hand, looked at the Jesuit with astonishment, he placed his forefinger on his lip, as if to impose silence on her, reached the door by walking backwards on the points of his toes, and left the room, after having cast another look of commiseration on Dagobert, who, in deep distress, with his head bowed down, and his hands crossed over his breast, remained silent to all the anxious consolations that La Mayeux was using to him.

When Rodin had quitted the room, Adrienne, approaching the soldier, said to him, in her gentle voice, and with an expression of touching interest,—

"Your sudden entry has prevented me from asking you a question in which I am much interested,—how is your wound?"

"Thank you, mademoiselle," said Dagobert, starting from his painful reverie, "thank you; but it is no great matter, and I have not had time even to think of it. I am sorry to have been so rude in your presence as to turn this rogue out of the room, but my temper gets the better of me, and at the sight of these scoundrels I cannot restrain myself."

"And yet, believe me, you have been too prompt in your sentence on the person who was here just now."

"Too prompt, mademoiselle! Oh! it is not to-day that I met him for the first time. He was with that renegade the Abbé d'Aigrigny."

"He was; but that does not prevent him from being an honest and excellent man."

"He?" exclaimed Dagobert.

"Yes, sure; at this moment there is but one thought that occupies his mind, and that is to restore your dear children to you."

"He?" said Dagobert, looking at Adrienne as if he could not believe what he heard; "he restore my dear children to me?"

"Yes, and sooner, perhaps, than you suppose."

"Mademoiselle," said Dagobert, suddenly, "he deceives you.—you are the dupe of this old vagabond."

"No," said Adrienne, shaking her head, and smiling, "I have proofs of his sincerity; the first is, that it is he who has enabled me to quit this house."

"Can it be possible?" said Dagobert, amazed.

"Quite true! and what is more, here is something which may, perhaps, reconcile him with you," said Adrienne, giving him the small packet which Rodin had handed to her before he quitted the apartment. "Unwilling to exasperate you farther by his presence, he said to me, 'Mademoiselle, hand this to the brave soldier, that will be my vengeance.'"

Dagobert looked at Mademoiselle de Cardoville with surprise, and opened the small parcel mechanically. When he had unfolded it, and recognised his silver cross, blackened by years, and the old red riband, faded as it was, which had been stolen from him at the inn of the White Falcon, with his papers, he exclaimed, with a broken voice and beating heart,—

"My cross! my cross!—it is my cross!"

And in the enthusiasm of his joy he pressed the silver star against his grizzled moustache.

Adrienne and La Mayeux felt themselves deeply affected by the soldier's emotion, who exclaimed, hastening towards the door at which Rodin had gone out,—

"After a service done to Marshal Simon, to my wife, or my son, no one could confer a greater favour on myself. And you answer for this worthy man, do you, mademoiselle? and I have wronged him, ill-treated him, in your presence. He has a right to an apology, and he shall have it—he shall have it!"

So saying, Dagobert went out of the room hastily, crossed two rooms, reached the staircase, and, descending rapidly, caught Rodin on the bottom stair.

"Monsieur," said the soldier, in a voice of emotion, and taking him by the arm, "you must return immediately."

"It would be as well, my dear sir," said Rodin, stopping good-humouredly, "if you would make up your mind; only a moment since and you ordered me out, and now you countermand me back again. Where is all this to end?"

"But a minute ago I was wrong, and when I am wrong I am always anxious to make reparation. I have ill-used you, assaulted you before witnesses, and before witnesses I wish to apologise to you."

"But,—my dear sir, I thank you—but—I am haste."

"What is your haste to me? I tell you you must come upstairs again directly. If not—if not," continued Dagobert, taking the Jesuit's hand, and pressing it with equal warmth and compunction, "if not, the joy you have caused me in restoring my cross will be incomplete."

"If that be the case, my good friend, let us go upstairs again—let us go directly."

"Not only have you restored to me my cross, which I—I—have—have—wept over,—don't say so to any one," said Dagobert, with eagerness; "but this young lady tells me that, thanks to you, these poor children,—mind it is no false hopes,—is it really true—is it really true?"

"Eh! eh! how inquisitive he is!" said Rodin, with a cunning smile. Then he added, "Come, come, make your mind easy, you shall have your two angels, old good-for-nothing."

And the Jesuit returned up the staircase.

"They will be restored to me, and to-day?" exclaimed Dagobert; and as Rodin went up the stairs, he stopped him suddenly by the sleeve.

"Now, my good friend, we are decidedly stopping on our road," said the Jesuit; "are we to go up or go down? really you knock me about like a shuttlecock."

"True, true! upstairs you will explain to us better. Come then as quickly as possible," said Dagobert.

Then putting his arm under Rodin's he hurried him along, and conducted him triumphantly into the apartment, where Adrienne and La Mayeux had remained, greatly surprised at the sudden disappearance of the soldier.

"Here he is! here he is!" said Dagobert, entering; "I overtook him at the bottom of the staircase."

"And you made me return at a smartish pace," added Rodin, somewhat out of wind.

"Now, sir," said Dagobert, with a serious voice, "I declare before mademoiselle that I was wrong to assault you, to ill-use you, and I offer my apologies, sir; and I am assured, and joyfully, that I owe you, oh! much—very much; and I swear to you that when I owe, I pay."

And Dagobert extended his hand with much heartiness to Rodin, who shook it in a friendly manner, adding,—

"Eh! what does all this mean? what is the great service of which you speak to me?"

"This!" said Dagobert, making the cross shine in Rodin's eyes; "but you do not know what it is to me to have the cross restored?"

"On the contrary, supposing that you must have a great regard for it, I thought to have the pleasure of handing it to you myself, and that was the reason why I brought it. But, between ourselves, you gave me when we met such a familiar reception, that I really had not time."

"Sir," said Dagobert, confused, "I assure you that I repent excessively what I did."

"I know it, my worthy friend, and so do not let us say another word about it. But I see you were fond of your cross."

"Fond of it, sir!" exclaimed Dagobert; "why this cross" (and he kissed it) "is a relic of mine. He who gave it me was my saint, and he had touched it."

"What!" said Rodin, affecting to look at the cross with as much curiosity as respectful admiration; "what! Napoleon—the great Napoleon—has touched it with his own hand—his own victorious hand—that noble star of honour?"

"Yes, sir, with his own hand he placed it here on my bleeding breast as a heal-all for my fifth wound. So, you see, I believe that if I were bursting with hunger between my food and my cross, I should not hesitate, in order that I might have it on my breast, in dying. But enough—enough! let us talk of something else. This is very foolish!" added Dagobert, rubbing his hand across his eyes; then as if ashamed of denying what he felt, "Yes! yes!" he said, lifting up his head quickly, and disclosing the tear that was rolling down his cheek, "yes, I weep with joy at having found my cross—my cross which the emperor gave me, with his victorious hand, as this worthy gentleman says."

"Blessed, then, be my poor old hand which has restored to you so valuable a treasure!" said Rodin, with emotion. Then he added, "Ma foi! the day will be a happy one for every body, as I told you this morning in my letter."

"That letter without any signature?" inquired the soldier, more and more surprised; "did that letter come from you?"

"Yes, it was I who wrote it. Only fearing some new plot from the Abbé d'Aigrigny, I was not willing, you must know, to explain myself more clearly."

"Then I shall see the orphans again?"

Rodin made an affirmative nod with his head, full of benevolence.

"Yes, forthwith—in a moment, perhaps—" said Adrienne, with a smile. "Well, was it right when I told you that you had misjudged this gentleman?"

"And why did he not say so when I first saw him?" cried Dagobert, in the fulness of his joy.

"For the very trifling reason, my good friend," answered Rodin, "that your first act upon entering was to endeavour to strangle me."

"True, true! I was too hasty. But still how could it be otherwise, when, up to the present minute, I had always seen you assisting the Abbé d'Aigrigny in his villany against us; and therefore, naturally enough, my first impulse led me——"

"This young lady," said Rodin, profoundly bowing to Adrienne—"this dear young lady will tell you how unconsciously I have been made to assist the unprincipled schemes of others; but so soon as the conviction of their base and treacherous designs burst upon my mind, I hastened to quit the wrong road I had taken for the straightforward path of honour and rectitude."

To the eagerly inquiring look of Dagobert, Adrienne returned a look of smiling assent.

"That I did not affix my name to the letter I sent you, my worthy friend, it was because I feared by so doing to excite your doubts of my sincerity; and my only motive for requesting you to come hither, instead of proceeding to the convent, was that, as well as this dear lady, I was apprehensive of your being recognised either by the porter or gardener, and the attempt of the other night might make such a circumstance highly dangerous to you."

"But," said Adrienne, "now I remember Dr. Baleinier is acquainted with all that took place, and even threatened to place M. Dagobert and his son in the hands of justice if I took any proceedings against himself."

"Be under no fear, my dear young lady," replied Rodin; "it will be for you henceforward to dictate, and him to subscribe to the conditions imposed; place implicit reliance in me. As for you, my excellent friend, your troubles are at an end."

"Oh, yes!" exclaimed Adrienne, "an upright and benevolent magistrate has gone to the convent to demand the daughters of General Simon, whom he will immediately conduct hither. But although he concurred with me in thinking it would be better for them to reside with me, I cannot decide upon this step without your consent, for it was to your care their mother intrusted them."

"Oh, mademoiselle," replied Dagobert, "let me thank you from my very heart for this generous offer; my dear children will find a second parent in you. Only after the severe lesson I have had, I must ask your permission not to leave the door of their chamber night or day; and should they accompany you abroad, you must give me leave to follow them at a respectful distance, and the same favour for Kill-joy, who has shewn himself a far more watchful guardian than myself. When once the Maréchal returns—and he may be daily expected—there will be an end to all this anxiety; and my only prayer is that he may take the charge off my hands before fresh troubles arise. God grant he may come quickly!"

"Amen!" responded Rodin, in a firm and determined voice. "I join with you, my worthy friend, in praying for the speedy arrival of the Maréchal; but let M. d'Aigrigny beware, for a terrible reckoning will be demanded by the father for all the persecutions his poor children have undergone; and yet heavy as is the catalogue, M. le Maréchal knows not all as yet."

"And have you no fear for the safety of the renegade?" inquired Dagobert, impressed with the idea of the fast approaching meeting between the Marquis and Maréchal Simon.

"I have no fears to waste on such cowardly traitors as M. d'Aigrigny," responded Rodin; "and when M. le Maréchal Simon has once returned——"

Then after a pause of several moments, he said,—

"Only let M. le Maréchal deign to hear what I have to tell him, and he will be thunderstruck at the conduct of M. d'Aigrigny; and he will then learn that his dearest friends, as well as himself, have been marked out as objects of the deadly hatred of this dangerous man."

"How so?" inquired Dagobert.

"How so?" answered Rodin; "why are not you yourself an example of what I assert?"

"I?"

"Do you suppose that chance alone brought about the scene at the inn of the White Falcon, near Leipsic?"

"Who told you what occurred there?" asked Dagobert, struck with surprise.

"Had you engaged in the quarrel into which Morok sought to draw you, you would have fallen into a snare purposely laid to entrap you; and by refusing, you were then arrested, for want of your papers, and thrown into prison as a vagabond, as well as the poor orphans you were conducting to France. But are you aware that the aim and end of all this violence was to prevent your being here on the 13th of February?"

"The more I listen to you," said Adrienne, "the greater is my horror to find to what extent the Abbé d'Aigrigny carried his wickedness, and how widely spread were the means employed to effect his purposes. In truth," continued she, with profound amazement at all she heard, "were it not that you well deserve to be believed——"

"You would be inclined to doubt the truth of what he asserts; is it not so, mademoiselle?" said Dagobert, "that is just my opinion; for infamous as has been the conduct of this renegade, I yet cannot persuade myself to believe he could be in communication with a wild-beast showman in the most distant part of Saxony. Besides, how could he possibly have known that the children and myself were to pass through Leipsic? No, no, my good sir, this is neither probable nor practicable."

"I am almost inclined to think," replied Adrienne, "that your just abhorrence of the ill practices of the Abbé d'Aigrigny carries you too far, and misleads your judgment, until you attribute to him an almost fabulous extent of power and resources."

After a short silence, during which Rodin alternately regarded Adrienne and Dagobert with a sort of commiserating glance, he said,—

“And how should your cross have found its way into the hands of the Abbé d'Aigrigny had he not been in correspondence with Morok?”

“In good truth, sir,” replied Dagobert, “the excess of my joy at recovering it put that very natural question out of my head. But tell me, I beg you, by what chance did it fall into your possession?”

“Simply in consequence of these relationships between M. d'Aigrigny and his agents at Leipsic, which yourself and this dear lady appear to doubt.”

“But, then, how came it to pass that, whereas I lost my cross at Leipsic, I find it in your care and keeping in Paris?”

“Answer me this one question. You were arrested at Leipsic for want of the necessary papers and passports, were you not?”

“I was: but I could never imagine by what means both my papers and money disappeared from my bag. I always supposed I had been unfortunate enough to lose them.”

Rodin shrugged up his shoulders, and then replied,—

“They were stolen from you at the inn of the White Falcon by Goliath, one of the emissaries of Morok, who forwarded his plunder to the Abbé d'Aigrigny, in proof of his having executed the orders given to effect your detention at Leipsic, as well as the young orphans. It was but the day before yesterday I had the key to the whole of this black transaction; both cross and papers were deposited among the records of the Abbé d'Aigrigny, and the papers were of so considerable a bulk that I durst not attempt their removal. Still, hoping to meet you this morning, after the letter I had addressed to you, and well aware what a sacred and beloved relic is his cross in the eyes of an old soldier who served under our idolised emperor,—why, my worthy friend, I will at once confess that I hesitated not to take possession of it in your name, and put it at once in my pocket. For, after all, said I, it is only restoring that which is justly the property of another, and I must not allow my over-scrupulous delicacy to dissuade me from conveying it back to its owner.”

“You could not have performed a more praiseworthy action!” said Adrienne; “and I for one, by reason of the deep interest I take in M. Dagobert, feel myself personally grateful to you for acting as you did.”

Then pausing for a few seconds, she resumed with much anxiety,—

“But tell me, I conjure you, what is the nature of that terrible power with which M. d'Aigrigny seems armed, that he can thus extend his schemes even to foreign lands?”

“Hush!” cried Rodin, in a low whisper, and looking around him with a terrified gaze; “hush! hush! for the love of heaven question me not on that subject!”

CHAPTER XXIII.

REVELATIONS.

MADemoiselle DE CARDOVILLE, greatly astonished at Rodin's alarm when she asked him for an explanation as to the very formidable and widely extended power which the Abbé d'Aigrigny exercised, said to him,—

"But, sir, what is there so strange in the question that I have just asked of you?"

Rodin, after a moment's silence, looking about him with admirably feigned disquietude, replied in a low tone,—

"Once again, mademoiselle, I entreat you not to interrogate me on so terrible a matter! the walls of this house have ears, as they say vulgarly."

Adrienne and Dagobert looked at each other with increased surprise.

La Mayeux, with the instinct of inconceivable pertinacity, continued to experience a sentiment of invincible mistrust against Rodin. Sometimes she looked at him covertly, endeavouring to penetrate beneath the mask of the man who thus inspired her with dread. One moment the Jesuit met the uneasy look of La Mayeux obstinately fixed upon him, and then he made her a slight, but benevolent, nod of the head, at which the young girl, alarmed at being thus detected, turned away her eyes and shuddered.

"No, no, my dear young lady," continued Rodin, with a sigh, when he saw that Mademoiselle de Cardoville was astonished at his silence, "do not question me as to the Abbé d'Aigrigny's power."

"But once more, sir," said Adrienne, "why this hesitation in replying to me? What is there to fear?"

"Ah! my dear young lady," said Rodin, with a shudder, "these persons are so powerful—their animosity is so terrible!"

"Take courage, sir, I owe you too much to permit my aid ever to be wanting to you."

"Oh! my dear young lady," exclaimed Rodin, as though almost offended, "judge of me better, I beseech you. Do you suppose that it is for myself that I fear? No, no, I am too obscure, too inoffensive! But it is you!—it is Marshal Simon, and all the other persons of your family, who have every thing to fear. Indeed, my dear young lady, I assure you over again, that you must not press me. There are secrets that are injurious to those who possess them."

"But, sir, is it not best to know the dangers with which one is menaced?"

"When one knows the manœuvres of one's enemy, at least one can defend oneself," said Dagobert. "I like an attack in open day better than an ambuscade."

"I must tell you," added Adrienne, "that the few words you have told me inspired me with indescribable uneasiness."

"Then, since it must be so, my dear young lady," replied the Jesuit, appearing to make a great effort with himself; "since you cannot comprehend from my obscure hints, I will be more explicit. But remember," he added, in a serious tone,—“remember that your strong solicitation has compelled me to tell you that of which you had, perhaps, better have been ignorant.”

“I beg you to speak out, sir,—pray do,” said Adrienne.

Rodin, drawing close to Adrienne, Dagobert, and La Mayeux, said to them with a mysterious air, “Have you never heard of a powerful association which extends its net over the whole earth, which includes amongst its affiliated brethren the seids and fanatics of all classes of society, which has had, and still has, the ear of kings and grandees,—an all-powerful association which, with a word, elevates its creatures to the most exalted position, and, with a word also, casts them back into the nothingness whence it can alone rescue them?”

“Oh, sir!” replied Adrienne, “what can this formidable association be? I never heard it mentioned.”

“I believe you, my dear young lady, and yet your ignorance on this subject astonishes me excessively.”

“Astonishes you? and wherefore?”

“Because you have lived so long with your aunt and so often seen the Abbé d'Aigrigny.”

“I have lived at Madame de Saint-Dizier's hotel, but not with her, for she inspired me with a legitimate aversion in a thousand ways.”

“In truth, my dear young lady, my remark was not just; it was there more than elsewhere that they would have preserved profound silence as to this association; and yet it is owing to it that Madame de Saint-Dizier has enjoyed such strong influence in the world under the last reign. Well, then, now you shall know it. It is the system of this association which renders the Abbé d'Aigrigny so dangerous a man; by it he has been able to watch, pursue, and reach the different members of your family,—those in Siberia, those in India, and others in the midst of the mountains of America; for, as I told you, by chance, the day before yesterday, in looking over the papers of the Abbé d'Aigrigny, I was put on the right scent, and fully convinced of his affiliation with this society, of which he is the most active and intelligent chief.”

“But, sir, the name—the name of the society?” inquired Adrienne.

“Well—it is —” and Rodin paused.

“It is —” said Adrienne, as deeply interested as Dagobert and La Mayeux — “it is —”

Rodin looked round about him, drew by a sign the other actors in this scene still closer to him, and said in a low voice, and laying emphasis on each syllable,—

“It is — it is — the Society of Jesus!!” and he shuddered.

“The Jesuits!” exclaimed Mademoiselle de Cardoville, unable to repress a burst of laughter, which was the more hearty, because, after the mysterious and deprecatory precaution of Rodin, she expected a revelation in her opinion infinitely more terrible. “The Jesuits!” she repeated, still laughing; “why, they only exist in books,—they are but historical personages,—very fearful I believe; but why thus disguise Madame de Saint-Dizier and M. d'Aigrigny? Such as they are, do they not fully justify my disdain and aversion?”

After having silently listened to Mademoiselle de Cardoville, Rodin answered with a serious and earnest air,—

"Your blindness alarms me, my dear young lady; the past ought to have made you fear for the future; for you, more than any person, have already suffered by the sinister conduct of this society, the existence of which you look at as a dream."

"I, sir?" said Adrienne, smiling, although greatly surprised.

"You!"

"And in what way?"

"Do you ask me, my dear young lady? Do you really ask me—you, who have been shut up here as a lunatic? Have I still to tell you that the master of this house is one of the most devoted of the lay members of this company, and, as such, the blind instrument of the Abbé d'Aigrigny?"

"Thus," said Adrienne, but without any smile this time, "M. Baleinier——"

"Obeyed the Abbé d'Aigrigny, the most dreaded chief of this dread society. He uses his genius for evil. But, it must be confessed, that he is a man of genius; and, therefore, it is that, even out of this abode, you and your family ought to concentrate all your vigilance, all your suspicions on him. For, believe me, I know him; and he does not consider the game as lost yet. You must expect fresh attacks—no doubt of another nature, but, for that very reason, still more dangerous."

"Luckily you will foresee them, my worthy sir," said Dagobert, "and you will be with us."

"I can do but little, my worthy friend; but that little is at the service of good persons," said Rodin.

"Now," said Adrienne, with a pensive air, completely persuaded by the conviction of Rodin's manner, "now I can understand the inconceivable influence which my aunt exercised over every body, and which I attributed solely to her connexion with powerful persons. I thought it more than probable that she and the Abbé d'Aigrigny were associated with some dark intrigues, of which religion was the veil; but I was far from believing what you now tell me."

"And of how many more things are you still in utter ignorance?" resumed Rodin. "If you knew, my dear young lady, with what art these people surround your mansions with agents who are devoted to them! When they desire to be informed on any particular in which you are concerned, not an action or gesture of yours escapes them. Then, by degrees, they act—act silently, quietly, and in the dark. They surround you with all possible means and agencies, from flattery to terror; they seduce or alarm you in order to control you, without your consciousness of their authority. Such is their aim; and, it must be allowed, they attain it frequently with most devoted skill."

Rodin spoke with so much sincerity, that Adrienne trembled; then, reproaching herself with her fears, she said,—

"And yet, no—no, never; I never can believe in so infernal a power. Once again, I say, the influence of these ambitious priests is of a by-gone age. Heaven be praised, they have all disappeared for ever!"

"Yes, they have certainly disappeared, for they know how and when to disperse and disappear under certain circumstances. But it is then, especially, that they are the most dangerous; for the mistrust which they inspire vanishes, and they are veiled in darkness. Oh, my dear young lady, if you knew their frightful skill! In my hatred for all that is oppressive, cowardly, and hypocritical, I had studied the history of this terrible company before I knew that the Abbé d'Aigrigny was a member of it. Oh, what fearful skill is theirs! If you only knew what means they employ! When I tell you that, thanks to their diabolical stratagems, the purest and most devout appearances often conceal most horrible snares." And Rodin's looks seemed accidentally to fall on La Mayeux; but, seeing that Adrienne did not perceive his insinuation, the Jesuit resumed, "In a word, if you are the object of their pursuits, if it be to their interest to ensnare you, from that instant mistrust all that surrounds you, suspect the most noble attachments, the most tender affections; for these monsters sometimes contrive to corrupt your best friends, and to employ them as auxiliaries against you—the more to be dreaded, as your confidence is the more blinded."

"It must be impossible," said Adrienne, who revolted at this; "you must exaggerate! No, no; hell has never dreamed of treacheries so horrible!"

"Alas, my dear young lady, one of your relatives, M. Hardy, one of the most frank and generous of men, has been in this way the victim of a most infamous treachery. In fact, do you know what the reading of your ancestor's will and testament has informed us of? Why, that he died the victim of the hatred of these people, and that, at this time, after a hundred and fifty years' interval, his descendants are still the objects of hatred to this undying society."

"Ah, sir, this terrifies me!" said Adrienne, her blood running cold at the thought. "But is there no defence against such assaults?"

"Prudence, my dear young lady, the most careful reserve, and an endless distrust of all who approach you."

"But such a life is frightful, sir; it is torture to be thus a prey to suspicions, doubts, and perpetual fears."

"Eh, no doubt; and well do these monsters know it! It is in that their strength lies; and they often triumph by the very excess of the precautions which are taken against them. Thus, my dear young lady, and you, my worthy and brave soldier, in the name of all that is dearest to you, beware, and do not give your confidence lightly. You have nearly been their victims, and they will always be your implacable enemies. And you, too, poor and interesting child," added the Jesuit, addressing La Mayeux, "follow my advice. Fear them; and sleep with one eye open, as the proverb says."

"I, sir!" said La Mayeux. "What have I done? what have I to fear?"

"What have you done? Do you not tenderly love this dear young lady, your protectress? Did you not attempt to come to her succour? Are you not the adopted sister of the son of this intrepid soldier, the worthy Agricola? Alas, poor girl! are these not titles sufficient for their hatred, in spite of your obscurity? Ah, my dear young lady, do not think that I exaggerate! Reflect, reflect! Remember what I have told you in reference to the faithful companion in arms of Marshal Simon, relative to his imprisonment at Leipsic! Remember what has occurred to you yourself, who was conducted here in spite of all law and all justice! And then you will see that there is no exaggeration in this picture of the occult powers of this company. Be always on your guard; and, especially, my dear young lady, in all doubtful cases, have no fear of addressing yourself to me. In three days I have learned enough by my own experience of this mode of action to be able to point out to you a snare, a stratagem, or a danger, and to defend you from it."

"Under such circumstances, sir," replied Mademoiselle de Cardoville, "and if my gratitude were out of sight, would not my interest point you out as my safest adviser?"

According to the habitual tactics of the sons of Loyola, who sometimes deny their very existence in order to escape from their adversaries—sometimes, on the contrary, boldly proclaim the active and diffused power of their organisation in order to intimidate the weak—Rodin had laughed in the teeth of the land-steward of Cardoville, when he had alluded to the existence of the Jesuits whilst at the convent, in tracing out, as he had done, their means and springs of action. He tried and had succeeded in inspiring Mademoiselle de Cardoville with a certain amount of alarm, which would gradually increase on reflection, and serve at a later period the sinister projects which he meditated.

La Mayeux experienced still the utmost terror at Rodin; still when she heard him unmask to Adrienne the sinister power of the order which he said was so redoubtable, the young work-girl, far from suspecting the Jesuit of the boldness of speaking thus of an association of which he was a member, felt grateful to him, in spite of herself, for the important advice which he had given to Mademoiselle de Cardoville.

The glance she now gave him (and which Rodin observed also, for he watched the young girl with immovable attention) was full of gratitude and wonder.

Understanding that expression, and desirous of increasing its effect, and endeavouring to eradicate the distrust which had crept into La Mayeux's mind, and to anticipate a disclosure which must be made sooner or later, the Jesuit appeared to have forgotten something very important, and exclaimed, striking his forehead,—

"What was I thinking of?"

Then addressing La Mayeux,—

"Do you know, my dear girl, where your sister is?"

Equally abashed and saddened at the question, La Mayeux replied, blushing deeply as she spoke, for she remembered her last meeting with the brilliant Queen-Bacchanal,—

"I have not seen my sister for some days, sir."

"Well, my dear girl, she is not very happy at this moment," said Rodin. "I have promised one of her friends to send her some small assistance; and, having spoken to a charitable individual, see what he gave me for her!" and he drew from his pocket a rouleau sealed up, which he handed to La Mayeux, who was as much affected as astonished.

"You have a sister who is unhappy, and I knew nothing about it!" said Adrienne to the work-woman. "Ah, my child, that's wrong!"

"Do not blame her," said Rodin. "In the first place, she did not know that her sister was unhappy, and then she could not ask you, my dear young lady, to interest yourself for her."

And, as Mademoiselle de Cardoville looked at Rodin with astonishment, he added, addressing himself to La Mayeux,—

"Is it not true, my girl?"

"Yes, sir," replied the work-girl, lowering her eyes and blushing again. Then she added with quickness and anxiety,—

"But my sister, sir, where did you see her? Where is she? In what way is she unhappy?"

"It would be too long a tale to tell you now, my dear girl; but go as quickly as you can to the Rue Clovis, to the greengrocer's shop, ask to speak to your sister from M. Charlemagne, or M. Rodin, whichever you please—for I am known there under my baptismal as well as my family name—and you will learn all particulars. Only tell your sister that, if she conducts herself properly, and continues to adhere to her present good resolutions, there are persons who continue to take an interest in her welfare."

La Mayeux, more and more astonished, was about to reply to M. Rodin, when the door opened, and M. de Gernande entered.

The magistrate's countenance was serious, and even sad.

"Where are Marshal Simon's daughter?" exclaimed Mademoiselle de Cardoville.

"Unfortunately, they have not accompanied me," replied the magistrate.

"And where are they, sir?—what has become of them? They were in the convent the day before yesterday!" cried Dagobert, aghast at this complete destruction of his hopes.

Scarcely had the soldier uttered these words, than, profiting by the movement of the actors in this scene, who were grouped closely around the magistrate, Rodin retreated a few steps, reached the door quickly, and withdrew, without any one observing his exit.

Whilst the soldier, thus completely driven to despair, was gazing at M. de Gernande, and awaiting his reply in the deepest anguish, Adrienne said to the magistrate,—

"But, sir, when you reached the convent, what answer did the superior make you on the subject of the two dear girls?"

"The superior refused to explain herself, mademoiselle. 'You assert, sir,' she said to me, 'that the young persons you speak of are detained here against their will. Well, then, since the law gives you the right to examine this house, pray exercise that power and search it.' 'But, madam, be so kind as reply to me positively,' I said to the superior: 'Do you declare yourself completely a stranger to this abstraction of the young girls whom I am here to demand?' 'I have nothing to say on the subject, sir. You say you are authorised to make a search—make it then!' Unable to obtain any other explanations," added the magistrate, "I have visited the convent in every part, and had every apartment opened. I regret to say I have not found any trace of the young ladies."

"They have conveyed them away to some other place," exclaimed Dagobert; "and who knows?—very ill, perhaps! They will kill them—they will kill them!" he exclaimed, in agonised accents.

"After such a refusal, what can we do? What is next to be thought of? Ah, pray, sir, aid us with your advice—you, our counselor—our aid!" said Adrienne, turning to speak to Rodin, whom she thought behind her. "What would be——"

Then, perceiving that the Jesuit had suddenly disappeared, she said to La Mayeux with uneasiness,—

"Where is M. Rodin?"

"I do not know, mademoiselle," replied La Mayeux, looking about her; "he is not here."

"It is very singular," said Adrienne, "that he should disappear so suddenly!"

"Didn't I tell you he was a traitor?" exclaimed Dagobert, stamping on the ground with rage. "Ah, they understand each other!"

"No, no," cried Mademoiselle de Cardoville, "do not think so, although the departure of M. Rodin is exceedingly to be lamented; for in this terrible dilemma, owing to the situation which M. Rodin occupied under M. d'Aigrigny, he might, perhaps, have afforded us very confidential information."

"I assure you, mademoiselle, that I quite relied upon it," said M. de Gernande; "and I returned here not only to inform you of my want of success, but to ask of this worthy and conscientious man, who has boldly unveiled these odious machinations, to give us all the information in his power in our painful position."

Strange to say, but for some time Dagobert had been so deeply absorbed, that he had not paid the slightest attention to what the magistrate said, although on a subject in which he was so much interested. He did not even remark the departure of M. de Gernande, who withdrew, after having promised Adrienne to leave no means untried to learn every particular connected with the disappearance of the two orphan children.

Uneasy at Dagobert's silence, and desirous of leaving the house immediately, and of inducing him to accompany her, Adrienne, after having exchanged a glance full of meaning with La Mayeux, approached the soldier, when rapid footsteps were suddenly heard outside the apartment, and a manly and powerful voice was heard exclaiming impatiently,—

"Where is he?—where is he?"

At this voice Dagobert started violently, gave a cry, and was bounding towards the door, when it opened.

Marshal Simon entered.

PIERRE SIMON, DUC DE LIGNY.

CHAPTER XXIV.

PIERRE SIMON.

MARSHAL PIERRE SIMON, Duc de Ligny, was of tall stature, and was plainly dressed in a blue frock-coat, buttoned up close to the chin, and in the top button-hole was a small piece of red riband.

It was impossible to see a physiognomy more frank, more open, and of more chivalrous distinction than the marshal's. His forehead was broad, his nose aquiline, the chin strongly defined, and his features tanned by exposure to the suns of India. His hair, cut very short, was grey about the temples, but his eyebrows were still of jet black, as well as his large drooping moustache; his free, bold, and decided carriage evinced his military breeding and tendencies; and a man of the people, a man of war and energy, the warm cordiality of his language breathed benevolence and sympathy. As enlightened as intrepid, as generous as sincere, there was in him most especially a high degree of plebeian pride; and, whilst others were proud of noble birth, he was proud of his obscure origin, because it had been ennobled by the fine character of his father, a stern Republican, and an intelligent and industrious artisan, who had been for forty years the honour, boast, and example of all laborious workmen.

When he accepted with gratitude the aristocratic title with which the Emperor had invested him, Pierre Simon had acted like those delicate-minded persons who, receiving with the warmth of friendship a gift perfectly useless, yet accept it with gratitude, as coming from the hand that presents it.

The religious adoration of Pierre Simon towards the Emperor had never been blind; in proportion to his devotion and ardent love for his idol had been his instinctive, and, as we may term it, fatal, so was his admiration serious and rational. Far from resembling those swordsmen who love battle only for battle's sake, not only did Marshal Simon admire his hero as the greatest captain in the world, but he admired him, above all, because he knew that the Emperor had only made or carried on war in the hopes of one day giving peace to the whole world; and if peace, acceded to by glory and power, is great, fertile, and magnificent, peace accepted by convention is barren, miserable, and dishonourable.

The son of an artisan, Pierre Simon admired the Emperor, also, because this imperial parvenu had always known how to vibrate gloriously on the popular fibre, and, remembering the people from whom he himself had sprung, he had fraternally invited them to enjoy with him all the pomps of aristocracy and royalty.

The features of Marshal Simon as he entered the chamber gave evidence of the deep feelings which were struggling within his breast, but at the sight of Dagobert a bright flush of joy illumined his manly countenance, as, hurrying with extended arms towards the soldier, he exclaimed,—

“My friend! my tried—my faithful friend!”

Poor Dagobert received in silence the warm and grateful pressure of the Marshal, who, releasing him from his arms, and fixing on him his earnest and tearful gaze, said, in an agitated tone and with quivering lips,—

“You arrived in time to be present on the 13th of February, did you not?”

“I did, general; but every thing relative to that day is now deferred for a period of four months.”

“And my wife—my child?”

A cold shudder shook the iron frame of Dagobert at this question; he drooped his head in mournful silence.

“Are they not here?” inquired Pierre Simon, with more surprise than uneasiness. “I learned at your abode that neither my wife nor child was there, but that I should find you at this house, and without a moment’s pause I hastened hither. They are not then here?”

“General,” replied Dagobert, growing ghastly pale—“general——” Then, wiping from his brows the large drops of cold perspiration which bedewed them, he strove in vain to frame a speech; his dried lips and parched throat deprived him of all power to utter.

“Speak, for the love of God!” cried Pierre Simon, becoming almost as pallid as the soldier himself. Then, seizing the old man by the arm, he added, “Your words, your manner, fill me with a dread of I know not what. Tell me, what does all this mean?”

At this moment Adrienne advanced, her charming face beaming with soft yet mournful sympathy. Pitying alike the embarrassment of Dagobert and the cruel anxiety of the Marshal, she sought to relieve both, and addressing Pierre Simon, in a voice of compassionating gentleness, she said,—

“Permit me to introduce myself, at this trying moment, as Adrienne de Cardoville, and still more, as the near relation of your dear children.”

Equally struck with the splendid beauty of Adrienne as by her words, Pierre Simon started back with surprise, while, in an agitated manner, he exclaimed,—

“You, madame, the relative of—my — children?”

And as he emphatically pronounced the last words he gazed in bewildered inquiry on the countenance of Dagobert.

“Yes, M. le Maréchal,” replied Adrienne quickly—“of your children; and may the affection of those charming twin-sisters ——”

“Twin-sisters!” cried Pierre Simon, interrupting Mademoiselle de Cardoville with a burst of joy he found it impossible to restrain.

“Two daughters to welcome me, when I had expected but one! Oh, what a double source of happiness must this have been to their dear mother!” Then, addressing Adrienne, he added, “Your pardon, mademoiselle, for so uncourteously omitting to thank you as I ought for the welcome tidings you have afforded me. My only excuse is in my joy at finding, after a separation of seventeen years from my wife, that I have now three claimants on my affection instead of one. Instruct me, I pray you, in the full extent, of the debt of gratitude I owe you.

You belong to our family,—I am, doubtless, beneath your hospitable roof, where my wife and children have also found shelter and protection. Is it not so? If you are of opinion that my abrupt appearance may be too much for them, I will wait till they are prepared to receive me; but, mademoiselle, let me entreat of you, who I am sure are as good as beautiful, to take pity on my impatience, and break the news of my arrival as quickly as possible to the three beloved beings I so long to fold to my heart."

Dagobert, more and more agitated, carefully avoided meeting the inquiring glances of the Maréchal, while his tall, sinewy frame shook, as though stricken with palsy, while Adrienne, shrinking from the cruel blow she felt must be inflicted on the fond hopes of the doating husband, cast down her tearful eyes, and waited in painful suspense for what must follow.

Surprised at a silence which both astonished and alarmed him, Pierre Simon gazed alternately from the soldier to Mademoiselle de Cardoville, when, struck by the deep dejection of their countenances, he exclaimed, in a tone of deep distress,—

"Dagobert! as you are a man, a husband, and a father, tell me—tell me what is this fearful thing you are concealing from me!"

Thus appealed to, the old soldier sought for words to tell his dreadful tale, but in vain, he could only indistinctly articulate,—

"General, — indeed — I ——"

"Do you, then, mademoiselle," cried Pierre Simon, "take pity on feelings amounting to agony worse than the most dreadful reality. My former apprehensions return—I fear I know not what—something fatal has occurred. Does any danger threaten my wife or my children? Why are they not here to welcome me? Perhaps they are ill. Oh, speak! I conjure you, speak!"

"Reassure yourself, I pray, M. le Maréchal," said Adrienne kindly, "your daughters have been slightly indisposed,—the result of their long and fatiguing journey; but there is nothing to apprehend on their account ——"

"Gracious Heaven!" interrupted the Maréchal; "'tis then my wife who is in danger?"

"Arm yourself with courage, M. le Maréchal," said Mademoiselle de Cardoville, sorrowfully; "you must henceforward look for happiness in the tender affection of the two interesting beings left to love and console you!"

"General," uttered Dagobert, in a steady, solemn voice, "I quitted Siberia in company of—your daughters only."

"And their mother—their adored mother!" exclaimed Simon, in a tone of thrilling agony.

"The day after her death," replied the old soldier, "I set out with her two children."

"Dead!" cried Pierre Simon, with heart-rending grief—"dead! My Eva? Oh, it cannot—cannot be!"

No voice arose in contradiction to the fatal tale—a solemn silence attested its melancholy truth.

As the full conviction of his misfortune pressed on the mind of the Maréchal, he staggered as though his very brain were giving way, supported himself for an instant by holding the back of a chair, then, sinking into the chair itself, concealed his features with both his hands, while the convulsive heaving of his breast abundantly testified the overpowering anguish under which he suffered.

For some time nothing was heard but the stifled sobs which arose from the labouring bosom and overcharged heart of Pierre Simon, who, most passionately loving his wife (for the many reasons detailed at the commencement of this history), had, as it were, by one of those singular compromises which a man, long and cruelly ill-treated by Fortune and by Fate, is apt to make with destiny, fully promised himself a bright and smiling future to indemnify him for so many years of sorrow and suffering. Like most tender and imaginative persons, Pierre Simon was also a fatalist, and fully reckoned upon his right to expect in the society of his wife and child a double compensation for the severe reverses and privations he had been made to suffer. In direct opposition to that class of persons whom a long succession of calamities renders callous or indifferent, Pierre Simon relied on experiencing a happiness as great as had been his misfortunes; his wife and child were the indispensable, nay the sole desiderata of his earthly hopes, the centre of all his pictures of perfect felicity, which were to compensate for the triste passages of his early life; and, had it pleased Heaven to remove his offspring, their mother, tenderly beloved as she was, could no more have satisfied his aching heart, than the two young creatures, bequeathed to his charge, were able to replace the idolised parent they had lost in his warm affections. Whether this deserve to be considered weakness of mind, or an over-exacting affection, we pretend not to declare; we merely wish to establish the fact of its being so, inasmuch as the destructive and incessant grief occasioned by his irreparable loss exercised a most powerful influence over the future destiny of Maréchal Simon.

Adrienne and Dagobert had bestowed a respectful deference on the overwhelming grief of the bereaved husband, who, when he had given free vent to his grief, raised his fine manly countenance, changed within the last few minutes to the colour of marble, drew his hand across his red and swollen eyes, rose from his chair, and, addressing Adrienne, said,—

"Excuse me, mademoiselle, for thus indulging in your presence in a grief too mighty for my powers of endurance. With your permission I will retire. I have many painful particulars to inquire from the faithful friend who witnessed the last moments of my wife; let me beg to be conducted to my poor girls—my bereaved and motherless children——" And again the choking sobs of the Maréchal extinguished his further utterance.

"Unhappily," replied Mademoiselle de Cardoville, "although, but a short time since, we fully expected the arrival of your children, our hopes have been disappointed." Pierre Simon looked silently at Adrienne, as though he had either not heard or comprehended her reply; "But pray take courage," added the kind-hearted girl, "we must not yet despair."

"Despair!" repeated the Maréchal mechanically, looking with perturbed and anxious glances from Mademoiselle de Cardoville to Dagobert. "Gracious God! what fresh blow is in store for me? What should we not despair of?"

"Of seeing your daughters again, M. le Maréchal," said Adrienne; "for the presence and authority of their father will give a fresh force to our researches."

"Researches?" cried Pierre Simon; "then my children are not here?"

"They are not," said Adrienne, making a violent effort to terminate the miserable suspense under which the Maréchal laboured. "I grieve to say they have been surreptitiously removed from the affectionate care of the worthy man who brought them hither from the very extremity of Russia and placed in a convent."

"Villain!" exclaimed Pierre Simon, advancing towards Dagobert, with flashing eyes and threatening mien, "dearly shall you answer to me for this!"

"Do not blame him," interposed Mademoiselle de Cardoville; "indeed—indeed, he merits not your displeasure."

"General," said Dagobert, in a firm, though dejected and submissive tone of voice, "I deserve your reproaches. I acted wrong to quit Paris (though compelled to do by business, in which the dear children's interests were concerned), still I believed them as secure under my wife's care as my own; but, poor creature! her head was fairly turned by her confessor, who persuaded her the children would be better off in a convent than with us: she believed him, and permitted them to be removed to a place chosen by this same confessor. Now they declare at the convent that they know nothing of the young ladies. This is the whole truth of the matter,—do with me what you will,—I shall endure it patiently, and without a murmur."

"This is past belief!" cried Pierre Simon, pointing to Dagobert with mingled contempt and indignation; "whom shall I venture to trust since he has so basely deceived me?"

"Ah, M. le Maréchal!" interposed Mademoiselle de Cardoville, "spare your angry reproaches,—believe not what he says; to my knowledge, he risked both life and honour in endeavouring to remove the children from the convent in which they were placed; nor is he the only person whose efforts have failed; for, even a magistrate, spite of the legal authority with which he was invested, failed to effect the deliverance of your children; for neither his firm and decided tone with the superior, nor the most minute search through every part of the convent, have availed to discover them."

"But where is this convent?" exclaimed Maréchal Simon, assuming an air of proud defiance, while his pale and agitated countenance bespoke the determined purpose of his soul—"where is it situated? Tell me, that I may hasten to demand my daughters,—they little know of what a parent is capable, whose children thus are stolen from him."

At the moment when Maréchal Simon, with his eyes fixed on the countenance of Dagobert, pronounced these words, Rodin, holding Rose and Blanche by the hand, appeared at the half-open door. As the exclamation of the Maréchal struck on his ear, he almost started with joy, while a gleam of fiendish pleasure illumined his sinister features, at finding Pierre Simon arrived at a period more opportune than he had ventured to hope for.

• Mademoiselle de Cardoville was the first to perceive the presence of Rodin, and, hastening towards him, she exclaimed,— sinking into the chair itself, concealed his features with both his hands, while the convulsive heaving of his breast abundantly testified the overpowering anguish under which he suffered.

For some time nothing was heard but the stifled sobs which arose from the labouring bosom and overcharged heart of Pierre Simon, who, most passionately loving his wife (for the many reasons detailed at the commencement of this history), had, as it were, by one of those singular compromises which a man, long and cruelly ill-treated by Fortune and by Fate, is apt to make with destiny, fully promised himself a bright and smiling future to indemnify him for so many years of sorrow and suffering. Like most tender and imaginative persons, Pierre Simon was also a fatalist, and fully reckoned upon his right to expect in the society of his wife and child a double compensation for the severe reverses and privations he had been made to suffer. In direct opposition to that class of persons whom a long succession of calamities renders callous or indifferent, Pierre Simon relied on experiencing a happiness as great as had been his misfortunes; his wife and child were the indispensable, nay the sole desiderata of his earthly hopes, the centre of all his pictures of perfect felicity, which were to compensate for the triste passages of his early life; and, had it pleased Heaven to remove his offspring, their mother, tenderly beloved as she was, could no more have satisfied his aching heart, than the two young creatures, bequeathed to his charge, were able to replace the idolised parent they had lost in his warm affections. Whether this deserve to be considered weakness of mind, or an over-exacting affection, we pretend not to declare; we merely wish to establish the fact of its being so, inasmuch as the destructive and incessant grief occasioned by his irreparable loss exercised a most powerful influence over the future destiny of Maréchal Simon.

Adrienne and Dagobert had bestowed a respectful deference on the overwhelming grief of the bereaved husband, who, when he had given free vent to his grief, raised his fine manly countenance, changed within the last few minutes to the colour of marble, drew his hand across his red and swollen eyes, rose from his chair, and, addressing Adrienne, said,—

“Excuse me, mademoiselle, for thus indulging in your presence in a grief too mighty for my powers of endurance. With your permission I will retire. I have many painful particulars to inquire from the faithful friend who witnessed the last moments of my wife; let me beg to be conducted to my poor girls—my bereaved and motherless children——” And again the choking sobs of the Maréchal extinguished his further utterance.

“Unhappily,” replied Mademoiselle de Cardoville, “although, but a short time since, we fully expected the arrival of your children, our hopes have been disappointed.” Pierre Simon looked silently at Adrienne, as though he had either not heard or comprehended her reply; “But pray take courage,” added the kind-hearted girl, “we must not yet despair.”

“Despair!” repeated the Maréchal mechanically, looking with perturbed and anxious glances from Mademoiselle de Cardoville to Dagobert. “Gracious God! what fresh blow is in store for me? What should we not despair of?”

"Of seeing your daughters again, M. le Maréchal," said Adrienne; "for the presence and authority of their father will give a fresh force to our researches."

"Researches?" cried Pierre Simon; "then my children are not here?"

"They are not," said Adrienne, making a violent effort to terminate the miserable suspense under which the Maréchal laboured. "I grieve to say they have been surreptitiously removed from the affectionate care of the worthy man who brought them hither from the very extremity of Russia and placed in a convent."

"Villain!" exclaimed Pierre Simon, advancing towards Dagobert, with flashing eyes and threatening mien, "dearly shall you answer to me for this!"

"Do not blame him," interposed Mademoiselle de Cardoville; "indeed—indeed, he merits not your displeasure."

"General," said Dagobert, in a firm, though dejected and submissive tone of voice, "I deserve your reproaches. I acted wrong to quit Paris (though compelled to do by business, in which the dear children's interests were concerned), still I believed them as secure under my wife's care as my own; but, poor creature! her head was fairly turned by her confessor, who persuaded her the children would be better off in a convent than with us: she believed him, and permitted them to be removed to a place chosen by this same confessor. Now they declare at the convent that they know nothing of the young ladies. This is the whole truth of the matter,—do with me what you will,—I shall endure it patiently, and without a murmur."

"This is past belief!" cried Pierre Simon, pointing to Dagobert with mingled contempt and indignation; "whom shall I venture to trust since he has so basely deceived me?"

"Ah, M. le Maréchal!" interposed Mademoiselle de Cardoville, "spare your angry reproaches,—believe not what he says; to my knowledge, he risked both life and honour in endeavouring to remove the children from the convent in which they were placed; nor is he the only person whose efforts have failed; for, even a magistrate, spite of the legal authority with which he was invested, failed to effect the deliverance of your children; for neither his firm and decided tone with the superior, nor the most minute search through every part of the convent, have availed to discover them."

"But where is this convent?" exclaimed Maréchal Simon, assuming an air of proud defiance, while his pale and agitated countenance bespoke the determined purpose of his soul—"where is it situated? Tell me, that I may hasten to demand my daughters,—they little know of what a parent is capable, whose children thus are stolen from him."

At the moment when Maréchal Simon, with his eyes fixed on the countenance of Dagobert, pronounced these words, Rodin, holding Rose and Blanche by the hand, appeared at the half-open door. As the exclamation of the Maréchal struck on his ear, he almost started with joy, while a gleam of fiendish pleasure illumined his sinister features, at finding Pierre Simon arrived at a period more opportune than he had ventured to hope for.

• Mademoiselle de Cardoville was the first to perceive the presence of Rodin, and, hastening towards him, she exclaimed,—

"Ah, I was not mistaken!—still and ever our providence—our good genius—our guardian angel!"

"My children!" said Rodin to the sisters, while he pointed to Pierre Simon, "behold your father!"

"See, M. le Maréchal," cried Adrienne, rushing towards Rose and Blanche—"see, Heaven restores you your children! Oh, what happiness!"

As Pierre Simon turned round, the sisters threw themselves upon his neck, and for several minutes no sound was heard but mingled sobs of joy, kisses, and affectionate expressions of delight.

"At least, come and enjoy the felicity you have effected," said Mademoiselle de Cardoville, drying her eyes, and turning towards Rodin, who, standing within the doorway and leaning against one side of it, appeared to contemplate the scene before him with the purest delight and sincerest sympathy.

Dagobert, at the sight of the children led in by Rodin, was so completely overcome by surprise, that he remained as though spell-bound; but, at the words of Adrienne, the excess of his gratitude seemed almost to deprive him of his senses, for, suddenly throwing himself at the feet of Rodin, and clasping his hands as though in prayer, he stammered out,—

"Thanks, thanks,—a thousand times thanks! you have given me more than life in thus restoring these children!"

"Ah, monsieur!" said La Mayeux, stimulated by the universal enthusiasm, "may Heaven reward and bless you for what you have done!"

"My good friends," said Rodin, as though overpowered by the force of his emotions, "this is too much—in truth, more than I am able to bear. Make my apologies, I pray of you, to M. le Maréchal, and tell him I am more than paid for my trifling service in being permitted to witness his happiness!"

"Nay, nay," said Adrienne, "let me beseech you not to quit us till the Maréchal is aware of all he owes you. Let him, at least, behold the man to whom we are all so greatly indebted."

"Stay, our universal friend and preserver!" cried Dagobert, striving, with all his energy, to detain Rodin.

"My dear young lady!" said Rodin, addressing Adrienne, "you called me but now your Providence,—remember, then, that Providence thinks ever more of the good that remains to be done than of that already accomplished!" Then added he, in a tone of mingled benevolence and cunning, "Would it not be better for me to occupy myself immediately in endeavours to discover Prince Djalma? My task is still unfinished, and the moments are precious. I am thankful to say," continued he, gently freeing himself from the vigorous grasp of Dagobert, "that the events of this day have been as propitious as I could have desired. The Abbé d'Aigrigny is unmasked,—you, my dear young lady, are restored to liberty,—my brave soldier here has recovered his valued cross,—La Mayeux is assured of a friend and protectress,—and M. le Maréchal is permitted to embrace his children. I have very small share in procuring all this, and my reward is a rich one. My heart glows, my conscience approves, and—adieu, my friends, adieu, for the present!"

So saying, Rodin, respectfully and affectionately saluting by a wave of his hand Adrienne, Dagobert, and La Mayeux, disappeared, first by a look directing their attention to Maréchal Simon, who, seated between his two daughters and alternately caressing and weeping over them, appeared wholly unconscious of what was passing around him.

An hour after this scene Mademoiselle de Cardoville, La Mayeux, with Maréchal Simon, his daughters, and Dagobert, had quitted the house of Dr. Baleinier.

On terminating this episode, let us add two words of moral as to the position of Lunatic Asylums and Convents.

We have said, and we repeat, that the law which now regulates the superintendence of lunatic asylums appears to us insufficient. Facts recently brought before the tribunals, and other facts of a most important character, which have been confided to us, seem plainly to prove this insufficiency.

No doubt but magistrates have full power to visit lunatic asylums, and this visit is even appointed; but we know from a sure source that the numerous and incessant occupations of the magistrates, whose power to discharge their duties is frequently very inadequate to the amount of those duties, render these inspections so rare that they are scarcely worthy of that appellation.

It appears to us, that it would be most useful to create and direct inspections at least every fortnight, and particularly devoted to the surveillance of lunatic asylums, consisting of a doctor and a magistrate, in order that their investigations should be submitted to a cross-examination.

No doubt justice is never wrong when sufficiently instructed; but there are so many formalities, so many difficulties, and especially when the unfortunate complainant has need to seek its aid, being as he is in a state of suspicion, isolation, and compulsory confinement, and has not out of doors one friend to take up his defence and appeal in his name to the constituted authorities!

Is it not, then, the duty of the civil power to anticipate these appeals by periodical visitations fitly appointed?

And what we say of lunatic asylums ought to apply, perhaps, even more strongly, to convents for females, to seminaries, and religious houses filled with large numbers.

Facts also very recent, very plain, and with which all France has rung, have unfortunately proved that violence, sequestrations, barbarous treatment, compulsion of female minors, illegal imprisonment accompanied by torture, were acts which, if not frequent, were at least possible in these religious houses.

It has required singular chances and horrid brutalities to make these detestable actions reach the knowledge of the public. How many other victims have been, and, perhaps, are still buried in these vast, silent mansions, where no profane look ever dares to penetrate, and which, from the immunities conceded to the clergy, escape the surveillance of the civil power?

Is it not deplorable that these houses are not subjected also to periodical visitations, consisting, if it be desired, of a chaplain, a magistrate, or some other person appointed by the municipal authority?

If nothing unlawful is perpetrated, and only what is humane and charitable allowed in these establishments, which have all the character, and, consequently, all the responsibility of public establishments, why is there this revolt, this fierce indignation of the priest-party, when what they call their franchises are discussed?

There is something beyond the laws deliberated and promulgated at Rome: it is the law of France, the law common to all, which gives protection to all, and which in its turn imposes on all—respect and obedience.

CHAPTER XXV.

THE INDIAN IN PARIS.

It was three days since Mademoiselle de Cardoville had quitted Dr. Baleinier's.

The following scene took place in a small house in the Rue Blanche, where Djalma had been conducted in the name of an unknown protector.

The reader will picture a pretty circular apartment, hung with Indian stuff of pearl-grey ground with purple devices, relieved by threads of gold; the ceiling towards the centre was hidden beneath similar draperies, fastened and drawn together by a thick silken cord; at each end of this cord, which dropped unequally, was suspended, in the form of an acorn, a small Indian lamp of gold filigree exquisitely fashioned.

By one of those ingenious combinations so common in barbarous countries, these lamps served also for perfume-burners: small plates of crystal, blue in colour, and chased down each side with arabesque ornaments, and lighted by a lamp within, shone with an azure so limpid that these golden lamps appeared like constellations of transparent sapphires: light clouds of whitish vapour rose from time to time about the two lamps, and filled the vacant space with balmy odour.

Daylight only entered this saloon (it was about two o'clock in the afternoon) by passing through a small conservatory, which was visible through a window of plate-glass, which formed the door also, and which was constructed to disappear in the thickness of the wall by sliding it along a groove made in the floor. A Chinese blind could be lowered at pleasure, and conceal or replace this glass.

Some dwarf palm-trees, musas, and other Indian vegetables, with thick leaves and of a green colour almost metallic, were arranged in clumps in this conservatory, and served as perspective and relief to two large chequered masses of exotic flowers, separated by a small path paved with Japanese blue and yellow tiles, which terminated at the foot of the plate-glass door.

The light, already much obstructed by the network* of leaves through which it struggled, had a hue of singular softness combined with the blue light of the perfumed lamps and the silvery brightness of the blazing hearth of a tall fireplace of oriental porphyry.

In this somewhat obscure apartment, strongly impregnated with sweet odours mingled with aromatic perfume of Persian tobacco, a man with brown and hanging locks, wearing a long gown of dark green fastened round his loins with a chequered girdle, was kneeling on a splendid Turkey carpet, carefully refreshing the fire in the golden furnace of a houka, the flexible and long pipe of which, after having rolled its coils on the carpet like a scarlet serpent with silver scales, terminated between the round and slender fingers of Djalma, who was indolently extended on a divan.

The young prince had his head uncovered, his jet-black hair with its bluish shades parted down his forehead, fell undulating and soft around his face and neck of antique beauty, and of a warm, transparent hue, like amber or topaz. Leaning on a cushion he reposed his chin on the palm of his right hand, whilst the wide sleeve of his tunic, falling back nearly to the bend of the elbow, shewed on his arm, as round as a woman's, the mysterious emblems formerly tattooed in India by the needle of the Strangler.

The son of Kadja-Sing held in his left hand the amber mouth-piece of his pipe. His tunic of magnificent white cashmere, of which the border was embroidered with a thousand colours, reached to his knees, and was confined round his slim and well-formed waist by the large folds of an orange shawl. The well-turned and symmetrical calf of one of the legs of this Asiatic Antinous, half-revealed by a fold of his tunic, was clad in a sort of gaiter, fitting closely, made of crimson velvet embroidered in silver, and hollowed out over the instep, where it met a small slipper of white morocco with a red heel.

Djalma's countenance, at once soft and masculine, expressed that melancholy and contemplative calm habitual to Indians and Arabs—those happy and privileged individuals, who by a rare mixture unite the meditative indolence of the dreamer with the powerful energy of the man of action, and sometimes delicate, nervous, and as easily excited as women, are at other times as resolute, fierce, and sanguinary as bandits.

And this half-feminine comparison applied to the nature of Arabs and Indians, when they are not roused by the excitement of battle or the scent of carnage, may be almost applied to them physically; for if, like high-bred women, they have small heads, hands, and feet, delicate joints, and figures as slender as they are supple, this delicate envelope always covers muscles of steel, and a spring and vigour purely virile.

Djalma's long eyes, like black diamonds set in bluish mother-of-pearl, wandered mechanically from the exotic flowers to the ceiling, and then from time to time he applied the amber of his houka to his lips; then, after a short inspiration, half opening his red lips strongly defined on the dazzling enamel of his teeth, he breathed forth a small spiral wreath of smoke, freshly aromatised by the rose-water through which it had been drawn.

"Shall I put more tobacco in the houka?" asked the man who was kneeling on the ground, turning his face towards Djalma, and displaying the sharp and sinister features of Faringhea the Strangler.

The young prince remained mute; either from his Oriental contempt for certain races he disdained to reply to the Métis, or absorbed in his reveries he did not hear him.

The Strangler was silent and crouched on the carpet; there with his legs crossed, his elbows on his knees, his chin on his two hands, and his eyes steadfastly fixed on Djalma, he awaited the reply or the orders of him whose sire was called the Father of the Generous.

How could Faringhea, the sanguinary disciple of Bohwanie, the deity of murder, have accepted or sought for an office so menial? How could this man, whose mind was of no common order, whose persuasive eloquence and determined energy had obtained so many valuable proselytes for the service of the good work, have brought himself to fulfil the inferior situation he now held? Or what ground was there for expecting that, profiting by the blind confidence of the young prince, the individual in question would respect the life of the son of Kadja-Sing? And, last of all, how would he be enabled to incur the risk of continually encountering Rodin, to whom he was so well known under circumstances by no means advantageous? The conclusion of our history will account for all these seeming contradictions and impossibilities. All that we shall now say on the subject is, that, after a long conversation with Rodin on the preceding evening, the Strangler had departed with serious air and downcast eyes from the presence of his companion.

After a long silence, during which Djalma appeared solely occupied in observing the thin vapour of smoke as it mounted from his houka and spread itself in the air, without troubling himself to regard Faringhea, he addressed him in that style, at once concise and hyperbolic, so peculiar to the nations of the East, saying,—

"The hour is past—he of the kind heart comes not! He will come yet. His word is his word."

"You have spoken well, my lord," answered Faringhea, in an approving tone; "when the good man came three days ago to visit you in this house, whither some wretches for their own evil purposes had caused you to be conveyed in a deep slumber produced by vile drugs (to which state I, your faithful and devoted follower, had likewise been reduced), he said to you, 'The unknown friend who sent to fetch you from the Château de Cardoville sends me to you, prince. Rely on me—follow me without fear; a dwelling worthy of your rank and merits is provided for you.' Then he said, 'Promise me not to quit this house until you see me again; your safety requires it. In three days' time I will return; you will then be at liberty to act as you please.' You agreed to do as he wished you, my lord; and, during the three last days, you have not once left this house."

"Still I wait the coming of the old man with much impatience," replied Djalma, "for this solitude wearies and oppresses me; there must be so many fine and beautiful things to see in Paris."

Djalma ceased speaking, and a second time relapsed into a deep reverie.

After several minutes passed thus, the son of Kadja-Sing suddenly exclaimed, in a tone at once haughty, impatient, and listless,—

“Let me hear more words from you!”

“Of what shall I discourse to my lord?”

“Of what you will,” answered Djalma, with contemptuous indifference, and fixing his half-closed eyes on the ceiling. “I am pursued incessantly by one thought—one idea. I wish to be relieved of it. Speak, then, that my mind may receive fresh images.”

Faringhea cast a scrutinising glance on the features of the young Indian, which were suffused with a faint red.

“My lord,” said the Métis, “I guess your thought. Your torment is revealed to my mental vision.”

Djalma shook his head without looking at the Strangler, who resumed,—

“My lord thinks of the lovely women of Paris.”

“Silence, slave!” exclaimed Djalma, turning abruptly on his sofa, as though some painful wound had been touched to the quick.

Faringhea said no more.

At the end of a few moments Djalma, throwing from him the pipe of his houka, and concealing his eyes with his hands, exclaimed,—

“Your words are preferable to your silence. Accursed be my thoughts, and equally accursed the inclination which calls up such fancies!”

“And why should my lord seek to fly his thoughts? You are now nineteen years of age. Your youth has been passed either in war or in prison; and, until the present hour, you have remained as unconscious of the power of love as our fellow-traveller, the young Christian priest Gabriel.”

Although Faringhea had in no way departed from his usual respectful and deferential tone, yet the prince felt a slight irony pervade the words of the Métis, more particularly when he alluded to his ignorance of the tender passion.

Djalma replied, in a tone at once haughty and severe,—

“I would not pass for a mere barbarian among the civilised people with whom I now am; and, therefore, I rejoice that my heart is as virgin snow on which no impression has yet been made.”

“My lord speaks riddles to his servant.”

“I would win and woo a woman pure and innocent as was my mother when my father received her to his arms, and here to obtain one like her we must be chaste and pure ourselves.”

At this idea Faringhea could not conceal a sardonic smile.

“And wherefore dost thou laugh, slave?” demanded the young prince, imperiously.

“I laughed, my prince, because among civilised nations nothing would excite more ridicule than the idea of a person marrying with such primitive notions of virgin innocence.”

“Thou liest, slave! He would be ridiculed only should he espouse a wife less pure than himself.”

“The only difference in such a case would be that, instead of mere ridicule, he would be tormented to madness by the pitiless raillery of all around him."

"'Tis false! 'tis false! or, if true, where learnedst thou this?"

"I have seen the women of this country, both in the Isle of France and at Pondicherry, my lord. Besides which I learned much during our voyage from a young French officer with whom I conversed almost as much as yourself did with the Christian priest Gabriel."

"Then it would seem that, like our sultans in their harems, the people of the civilised world exact from their females a purity they do not themselves possess?"

"In general, those who have the least in their own characters are most scrupulous in requiring it from their wives."

"To demand that which is not equally given is the conduct of a master to a slave. And how can such sentiments influence a free and generous nation?"

"My lord forgets that the law-maker is often the law-breaker, and that might is right; just the same as with us, my lord, where the stronger party takes what he desires and leaves the weaker to be satisfied with what they can obtain."

"And what do the females in this case?"

"My lord, they consider they have well performed their duty when they seek to prevent their husbands from rendering themselves ridiculous by any absurd protestations of immaculate innocence and virtue before their marriage."

"And for the wife who deceives—who betrays her husband's honour," said Djalma, springing suddenly up, and fixing on Faringhea a fierce glance, while his eyes glittered with fury, "how treat they such? Do they slay them?"

"Even so, my lord; as with us, a woman caught in crime washes it out in blood."

"Since, then, these civilised people are equally despotic with ourselves, why do they not shut up their wives as we do ours to compel their fidelity?"

"Because, my lord, they are as civilised as barbarous and as barbarous as civilised."

"There is much justice in your words, if they be true," replied Djalma, with a pensive air. Then he added with considerable excitement, and adopting in a certain degree the figurative and mystical language of his country,—

"In truth, slave, what thou sayest afflicts me greatly; for as two drops of heavenly dew mixing together in the calyx of a flower, so are two hearts mingling in a holy, chaste, and virgin love; like unto two rays of fire, uniting into one bright and imperishable flame are those glowing joys, those unfading delights, which wait upon two tender lovers joined in marriage bond."

When Djalma spake of the modest joys of the soul with inexpressible charm, whilst he depicted a less ideal happiness, he trembled perceptibly, his nostrils expanded, the pale gold hue of his complexion became flushed, and the young prince fell back in deep reflection.

Faringhea, having remarked this latter emotion, resumed,—

"And if, like the proud and bright king-bird* of our country, the sultan of our woods, you should prefer numerous and varied pleasures to sole and solitary loves,—young, handsome, rich as you are, monseigneur, if you seek for seductive Parisian females, you know, those lovely phantoms of your dreams, those charming houris of your nights,—if you cast on them looks that resemble a defiance, suppliant as a prayer or burning as a desire, do you not think that every half-downcast eye will inflame at your glances of fire? Then there will not be the monotonous delights of a single love—the heaviest chain in our existence. No! there will be the thousand delights of the harem, but that harem peopled with free and proud women whom happy love will render your slaves. Pure and self-restrained hitherto, you will not now commit excess. Then, believe me, ardent and magnificent, it is you, son of our land, who will become the love, the pride, the idolatry of these women; and these women, the most attractive in the world, will soon have eyes, and looks, and passion, but for you!"

Djalma had listened to Faringhea with anxious silence. The expression of the young Indian's features had completely altered; they no longer displayed the melancholy and dreamy youth, invoking the holy memory of his mother, and finding only in the dew of heaven, in the calyx of flowers, images sufficiently pure to paint the chastity, the love he dreamed of: it was not even the young man blushing with modest ardour at the thoughts of the delights of a legitimate union. No, no, the incitements of Faringhea had suddenly lighted up a subterranean fire. The burning countenance of Djalma, his eyes by turns sparkling and closed, the deep and echoing aspiration of his chest, betokened the fire in his blood and the excitement of his passions, the more energetic as they had been until then utterly repressed.

In a moment darting from the divan, active, vigorous, and light as a young tiger, Djalma seized Faringhea by the throat, exclaiming,—

"Your words burn like poison!"

"Monseigneur," said Faringhea, without offering the slightest resistance, "your slave is your slave."

This submission disarmed the prince.

"My life belongs to you," said the Métis.

"'Tis mine belongs to thee, slave!" exclaimed Djalma, repulsing him. "This moment I was hanging at thy lips, swallowing thy daring and dangerous lies."

"Lies, monseigneur! Only do you appear among these women, and their looks will confirm my words."

"These women love me!—me, who have only lived hitherto in war and in the forests?"

"When they remember that, so young, you have already had your bloody chases of men and tigers, they will adore you, monseigneur."

"Thou liest!"

"I tell you, monseigneur, when they see your hand, which, as delicate as their own, has yet been so often dipped in the blood of your enemies, they will kiss it; and kiss it again when they think that in our forests with your loaded carbine and poniard between your teeth, you have smiled at the roars of the lion and the panther, for whom you lay in wait."

* A variety of the bird of Paradise, very peculiar in its habits and instincts.

"But I am a savage—a barbarian——"

"And, therefore, they will be at your feet; they will seem at once frightened and charmed when they reflect on all the violence, all the fury, all the passion of jealousy, excitement, and love, to which a man of your blood, your youth, and your ardour, will give way. To-day, soft and tender; to-morrow, gloomy and fierce; next day, ardent and impassioned;—such will you be, such should you be, to attract them. Yes, yes; let a cry of rage escape between two kisses, let a dagger gleam between two caresses, let them but be frightened, exhausted, palpitating between love and fear, and you will be to them, not a man but a god!"

"Dost think so?" said Djalma, carried away, in spite of himself, by the wild eloquence of the Strangler.

"You know—you feel that I speak the truth," exclaimed Faringhea, extending his arms towards Djalma.

"Yes, indeed," replied Djalma, with eye of flame and expanded nostrils, as he paced up and down the apartment, as it were, by wild leaps and bounds, "I do not know if I am in my senses, or if I am drunk, but it seems as though you had spoken truly: yes, I feel it, I shall be loved with madness—with fury, because I shall love with madness and fury. They will tremble with pleasure and fear, because I myself, whilst I think of it, tremble with happiness and dread. Slave, thou sayest truly; and this love will be something overwhelming and terrific."

As Djalma spoke he was resplendent in his display of excited sense. It was a rare sight—a man having reached, pure and self-restrained, an age when the instincts of love, which the Almighty has so admirably engrafted on His creatures, begin to develop themselves in their all-powerful energy,—instincts which repressed, falsified, or perverted, may destroy the reason, or turn it to unbridled dissipation or horrid crimes, but which directed towards a great and noble passion may and ought, by their very violence, to raise a man through devotion and tenderness to the very extreme limits of the ideal.

"Ah, this woman! this woman! before whom I shall tremble, and who will tremble before me!—where is she?" exclaimed Djalma, in increased excitement. "Shall I ever, ever find her?"

"One is a difficulty, monseigneur," said Faringhea, with sardonic coolness: "he who seeks for one woman rarely finds her in this land; but he who seeks women will be embarrassed to make his choice."

* * * * *

At the moment when the Métis made this important reply to Djalma there was seen to stop at the small garden-gate of this house, a door which opened upon a deserted corner, a chariot of extreme elegance, with blue body on a white carriage, picked out with blue also. This chariot was drawn by two splendid blood bay-horses with black manes: the mountings of the harness were silver, as were the buttons of the servants, who wore a blue livery with white collars. On the hammercloth, of blue also, and trimmed with white fringe, as well as on the panels of the doors, were the coat-of-arms in a lozenge, without crest or coronet, as is usual on the carriages of single ladies.

There were two females in this chariot, Mademoiselle de Cardoville and Florine.

CHAPTER XXVI.

THE SLEEPING APARTMENT.

IN order to explain the arrival of Mademoiselle de Cardoville at the garden-door of the house occupied by Djalma, it is necessary to cast a retrospective glance over certain previous events.

Mademoiselle de Cardoville, on quitting Dr. Baleinier's house, had established herself in her abode in the Rue d'Anjou. For several of the last months of her residence with her aunt Adrienne had been secretly fitting up and furnishing this house, the splendour and elegance of which had been materially increased by all the marvels of taste and art from the pavilion of the Hôtel de Saint-Dizier.

The world thought it very extraordinary that a young lady of the age and rank of Mademoiselle de Cardoville should have determined on living alone, free, and keeping house like a bachelor long since of age, a young widow, or an emancipated minor.

The world appeared to be ignorant that Mademoiselle de Cardoville possessed what men who have reached their majority, or a majority twice told, do not always possess—a firm and decided character, a lofty imagination, a generous heart, and very right and just common sense.

Judging that she should require for the direction of her servants and the superintendence of her household persons of fidelity, Adrienne had written to the land-steward of the Cardoville estate and his wife, old servants of the family, to come instantly to Paris; intending M. Dupont to fulfil all the functions of a steward, and his wife, those of housekeeper. An old friend of Mademoiselle de Cardoville's father, the Comte de Montbron, a remarkably high-spirited old gentleman and formerly a leader in the fashionable world, and always a great connoisseur in matters of taste, had advised Adrienne to play the princess and have a squire; introducing to her, as fitted for that office, a man very well educated and past the prime of life, who, being passionately fond of horses, after having ruined himself in England, at Newmarket, Epsom, and Tattersall's, had been completely reduced, as frequently happens to gentlemen in that country, to drive a four-horse coach, finding in that occupation a means of getting an honest living, and also of gratifying his passion for horses. Such was M. de Bonnevillle, the protégé of the Comte de Montbron. His age and knowledge of the world were such as to give him authority to attend Mademoiselle de Cardoville on horseback; he could, better than any one, superintend her stables and the keeping up of her carriages. Consequently he accepted the employment with gratitude; and thanks to his enlightened zeal, the turn-out of Mademoiselle de Cardoville rivalled the most elegant in Paris.

Hebe, Georgette, and Florine, were all again in attendance on their young lady.

The last had been in the service of the Princess de Saint-Dizier, in order to keep up her character of spy to the profit of the superior of the convent of Sainte-Marie ; but when the Rennepont affair took the new turn given to it by Rodin, it was resolved that Florine, if it could be so contrived, should return to her old service with Mademoiselle de Cardoville. This post of confidence placing this miserable girl in a position to render important and dark services to those who held her fate in their hands, and constrained her to this sort of infamous treachery.

Unfortunately, every thing had tended to favour this machination.

We know that Florine, in an interview with La Mayeux a few days after Mademoiselle de Cardoville had been confined at Dr. Baleinier's, yielding to a feeling of remorse, had given the little work-woman very useful advice in the interests of Adrienne, by desiring that Agricola should not hand over to Madame de Saint-Dizier the papers he had found in the secret panel in the pavilion, and to trust them to no one but Mademoiselle de Cardoville herself, who, told of this subsequently by La Mayeux, felt her confidence in, and interest for Florine, redoubled by this fact, and took her back into her service with almost gratitude, employing her in an affair that was almost confidential, namely, the superintendence of the arrangements of the house engaged for Djalma's dwelling.

As to La Mayeux, yielding to the solicitations of Mademoiselle de Cardoville, and finding that she could no longer be useful to Dago-bert's wife, of whom we shall speak by and by, she had consented to remain in the hôtel of the Rue d'Anjou with Adrienne, who, with that sound sagacity which marked her character, had intrusted to the little sempstress, who also served her as a secretary, the department of assistance and almsgiving.

Mademoiselle de Cardoville had at first thought of keeping La Mayeux with her simply as her friend, desirous of thus honouring and exalting her honesty in labour, resignation in sorrow, and intelligence in poverty ; but, knowing the natural dignity of the young girl, she feared, and with reason, that, in spite of the extreme delicacy with which her sisterly hospitality might be offered to La Mayeux, she would only perceive in it charity in disguise. Adrienne therefore preferred, whilst she treated her quite as a friend, to give her a confidential occupation. In this way the nice sensibility of the sempstress was not affected, since she earned her livelihood by fulfilling duties which were most gratifying to her charitable and sympathising nature. In truth, no one was better qualified than La Mayeux to accept the holy mission confided to her by Adrienne ; her severe experience of misfortune, the excellence of her pure soul, the elevation of her mind, her vast activity, her penetration into the painful secrets of the unfortunate and suffering, and her intimate knowledge of the poor and laborious classes, all bespoke with what tact and good sense the excellent creature would second the generous intentions of Mademoiselle de Cardoville.

We will now allude to several circumstances which had on this day preceded Mademoiselle de Cardoville's arrival at the garden-door of the house in the Rue Blanche.

Although it was ten o'clock in the morning, the shutters of Adrienne's sleeping-room, hermetically closed, did not allow a ray of daylight to penetrate into the apartment, which was only lighted by a spherical lamp of oriental alabaster, suspended from the ceiling by three long silver chains.

The chamber, which had a dome, was arranged like a tent in eight divisions. From the top to the ground it was hung with white silk, covered with long white muslin draperies, puffed out and kept along the sides of the wall by bands, fastened at certain intervals by large ivory pateræ.

Two doors, also of ivory, elaborately inlaid with mother-of-pearl, led, the one to the bath and the other to the toilet-room—a sort of small temple raised to the worship of Beauty, and furnished as it had been in the pavilion of the Hôtel Saint-Dizier.

Two other divisions of the room were occupied by windows, completely concealed by draperies. In front of the bed there was (enclosing dog-irons of carved and massive silver) a Pendelic marble chimneypiece, a real snow of crystal, on which were carved two exquisite caryatides, and a frieze of birds and flowers. Above this frieze, and cut transparently in the marble, with marvellous delicacy, was a sort of basket, of oval shape and elegant design, which supplied the place of the mantelpiece, and was ornamented with a mass of red camelias, whose leaves of a brilliant green, and flowers of light carmine hue, were the only colours which would have justly harmonised with the virgin whiteness of this charming retreat.

Then, half-environed by the waves of white muslin, which fell from the dome like light clouds, was seen the very low bed, with its feet of ivory richly sculptured, and resting on the ermine carpet which decked the floor. Except a plinth, also of ivory, beautifully carved, and decorated with mother-of-pearl, the bed was entirely lined with white satin, wadded and worked like a vast scent-bag.

The cambric curtains trimmed with Valenciennes lace, being a little disturbed, revealed the end of a mattress covered with white silk, and the corner of a light watered-silk quilt; and in the apartment an equal and cold regulated temperature was kept up, like that of a fine spring day.

By a singular scruple, arising out of the same sentiment as that which had made Adrienne inscribe on a gem of goldsmith's work the name of the author instead of that of the seller, she had chosen that all these objects, which were so sumptuous and refined, should be made by artisans chosen from amongst the most intelligent, most industrious, and most honest of their class, to whom she had supplied the raw material; so that they could add to the price of their handiwork the amount of profit which the dealers in speculating on their labours would have added: and this increase of gain, which was very considerable, had afforded much happiness and ease to a hundred necessitous families, who, thus blessing Adrienne's munificence, gave her, as she said, the right to enjoy her luxury as an action that was right and good.

Nothing could be more fresh, more charming to see, than the interior of this sleeping-chamber.

Mademoiselle de Cardoville had just awakened, and was reposing in the midst of these waves of muslin, lace, cambric, and white silk, in an attitude full of softness and grace. During the night she never wore any covering on her splendid golden hair. (a certain mode by which to preserve it in all its beauties, according to the Greeks). At night her women arranged the long curls of her silky locks in sundry flat tresses, with which she formed two long and thick bandeaux, which, falling low enough, almost entirely concealed her small ear, of which only the rosy tip was visible, and then were intermingled with the large knot twisted up at the back of her head.

This head-dress, borrowed from the antique Greek, suited the pure and delicate features of Mademoiselle de Cardoville admirably, and seemed to make her look so youthful, that, instead of being eighteen years old, she seemed hardly fifteen. Her hair thus gathered closely about her temples lost its light and brilliant hue, and would have appeared almost brown, had it not been for the golden hues which played here and there in the undulation of her tresses.

Plunged in a matutinal torpor, whose warm drowsiness is so propitious to soft reveries, Adrienne was reclining on her pillow, her head somewhat bent, which heightened the ideal contour of her naked neck and shoulders; her smiling lips, moist and rosy, were, like her cheeks, as cool as if she had just bathed them in frozen water; her snowy lids half concealed her large dark-brown and soft eyes, which now gazed languidly on vacancy and now rested complacently on the red flowers and green leaves of the basket of camelias.

Who can depict the unutterable serenity of Adrienne's awaking—the awaking of a soul so lovely and chaste, in a body so chaste and lovely—the awaking of a heart as pure as the fresh and balmy breath of youth which undulated in her virgin bosom, as virgin white as “unsunned snows?”

The mingled thoughts which, since her waking, seemed gently to agitate Adrienne, absorbed her more and more: her head was bent over her bosom, and her beautiful arms hung down upon the couch, whilst her features, without becoming saddened, yet assumed an expression of touching melancholy.

Her most anxious desire was accomplished—she was about to live independent and alone; but her affectionate, delicate, expansive, and wonderfully perfect nature, perceived that God had not gifted her with all these treasures that they should be concealed in a cold and selfish solitude! She felt all that love could inspire of the great and the beautiful, both to herself and to him who should be worthy of her.

Full of reliance in the strength and nobility of her character, proud of the example which she desired to set to other women, knowing that all eyes were fixed on her with envy, she only felt perhaps too much self-confidence; and, far from having any distrust that she should make an ill or improper choice, she only feared that she should not find a fit selection to choose from, so purified was her taste. If, moreover, she should meet with her ideal, she had a mode of scrutiny so strange and yet so just, so extraordinary and yet so well-ordered, as to the independence and dignity which (in her opinion) women ought to maintain with respect to man, that, inexorably determined to make no concession on that point, she asked herself if the man of her choice would ever accept the conditions (until then unheard of) which she should impose upon him.

Recalling to her memory the possible pretenders whom, up to this period, she had met in the world, she recollected the picture, so unfortunately correct, which Rodin had traced with caustic severity, when talking of men who might offer. She remembered, too, and not without a certain degree of pride, the encouragement which that artful man had given her, not in flattering her, but in urging her to pursue the accomplishment of a design that was really so great, generous, and admirable.

The current or the caprice of Adrienne's thoughts soon led her to think of Djalma.

Whilst she congratulated herself for fulfilling towards this relative of royal blood the duties of a royal hospitality, the young girl was far from making the young prince the hero of her future destiny.

And she still further argued, and not without reason, that this half savage, being possessed of passions which, if not absolutely unconquerable, were as yet unconquered, must inevitably be doomed to pass through many severe ordeals, and to undergo the most complete transformation, as regarded his tastes, views, pursuits, and ideas. Now, as Mademoiselle de Cardoville was by no means of a masculine nature, neither did she possess the very smallest liking for notoriety or exercising sway, she felt no inclination to take upon herself the civilisation of the young Indian; therefore, in spite of the interest she took in him, or, rather, from that very interest, she had firmly resolved not to make herself known to him till two or three months should have elapsed; and still further determined, even if chance should make him acquainted with their relationship, not to receive him at her own house. Her wish was, if not to try him, at least, to leave him free master of his actions and inclinations, that he might take his own unfettered bias, whether for good or evil. Still unwilling to abandon him, all defenceless as he was, to the perils of a Parisian life, she had taken the Comte de Montbron into her confidence, and besought of him to introduce Prince Djalma into the best society of Paris, and to afford him the benefit of the Count's personal experience and valuable advice in all matters relative to a favourable début in the gay world.

M. de Montbron had lent a ready acquiescence to the request of Mademoiselle de Cardoville, feeling, as he said, the greatest possible pleasure in presenting his foreign novice to the first company Paris contained, and to put him in competition with the most polished élégants of the day, as a candidate for the smiles and favour of the Parisian belles; offering to bet to any amount on the success of his wild and uncivilised protégé.

"For my own part, my dear Count," said Mademoiselle de Cardoville, "my resolution is not to be shaken. You have yourself told me of the effect Prince Djalma's appearance in the fashionable world will produce. An Indian of nineteen years, possessed of surpassing beauty, proud and unbroken as the lion of the forest,

— he will be, you say, as new as extraordinary ; and, doubtless, will quickly be marked down as worthy the pursuit of our civilised coquettes, who will seek to attract his notice and engage his attention with a perseverance and spirit which make me fear for our young friend's chance of escape from their wiles. Now, seriously, my dear count, I feel not the slightest inclination to enter the lists with the many lovely females who will unhesitatingly throw themselves within reach of the claws of your young barbarian, in whom I take a deep interest ; in the first place, because he is my relative ; in the second, because he is young, brave, and handsome ; and, thirdly and principally, because he is not disfigured by wearing our horrible European costume ;—these claims on my regard are not, however, sufficiently powerful to induce me to change my mind for the present ; added to which, the good old philosopher, my recently acquired friend, has given me some very excellent advice concerning this young Indian, which has even been approved and confirmed by you, my dear count, who, certainly, are not the least bit of a philosopher, which is, for some time only to receive visitors, and not to accept of any invitations ; by which means I shall effectually avoid the awkwardness of meeting my royal relative, and, at the same time, enable me carefully to select even my most indifferent guests : for, as my establishment is well appointed, and my position in society quite original, the curious of both sexes will be but too happy to be admitted to a dwelling where they flatter themselves so many scandalous little facts may be gleaned, touching its eccentric mistress and her equally singular tastes and habits ; from all of which I promise myself infinite amusement."

And when M. de Montbron inquired whether the poor, young, royal tiger were doomed to be banished for a long period from her, Adrienne replied,—

"As nearly all the persons to whom you will have introduced him are among my visiting acquaintances, I shall thus be enabled, in a manner most amusing to myself, to hear the various opinions entertained respecting my royal cousin. If certain individuals of your sex speak highly of him, while some among my own find infinite fault with him, I shall have great hopes of his being all I desire to find him. In a word, the opinion I shall arrive at by separating the true from the false (and you may trust to my sagacity to be enabled to do so), will prolong or abridge what you are pleased to call the exile of my royal protégé."

Such were the positive intentions of Mademoiselle de Cardoville up to the very morning in which, in company with Florine, she repaired to the house inhabited by him. In fact, she had firmly resolved not to make herself known to him before the expiration of the next two or three months.

* * * * *

After having, on the morning we have been describing, long pondered over the probabilities and chances of finding what her heart desired, Adrienne fell into a deep and fresh train of thought.

Redolent with all the charms of youthful beauty, the fascinating being we are portraying heaved a gentle sigh, as though struck by some new and mournful idea, threw her white arms languidly over her head, and, turning her cheek on her pillow, lay for several minutes as though entranced, absorbed, in the vastness of her thoughts. Thus extended, motionless, beneath the delicate coverings which enfolded her graceful form, she might have been taken for some admirable work of sculpture, half revealed beneath a bed of snow.

All at once Adrienne started up, passed her hand lightly over her forehead, and rang for the attendance of her women. As the silver sounds issued from the bell the two doors of ivory gently opened, and Georgette appeared at the threshold of the dressing-room, while Lutine, the beautiful little black and tan spaniel, with its golden collar, sprung forward, and, with loud and glad barkings, welcomed the waking of its mistress. On the threshold of the bath-chamber stood Hebe.

At the end of this apartment, lighted only from the top, and covered over with a carpet of green morocco chequered with golden wreaths, stood a large crystal bath formed like a lengthened shell. The only joinings in this masterpiece of elegance were concealed beneath the graceful twinings of the wreaths of silver flowers springing upwards from the pedestal of the bath, also formed of the most exquisitely carved silver, and representing children sporting with dolphins amid branches of natural coral and azure shells.

Nothing could have produced a more smiling, light, and tasteful appearance than this mixture of bright scarlet with the sea-shells, contrasting so chastely with the dead-silver ground. The sweet balsamic odours which arose from the clear, warm, and perfumed element, already prepared in the crystal cone, diffused themselves throughout the room, and entered the sleeping apartment like a thin, vapoury dew.

As Adrienne observed Hebe in her pretty and becoming costume, standing with a long white wrapper thrown across her round and dimpled arm, she said,—

“Where is Florine, my good girl?”

“She has been downstairs these two hours, madam. She was sent for upon some very important and pressing business.”

“Do you know who sent for her?”

“The young person you employ as your secretary, madam. She went out very early this morning, and, immediately upon her return, asked to see Florine, who immediately went to her, and has not since returned.”

“No doubt this absence is relative to some important affair my amiable almoner has in hand,” said Adrienne, smiling with pleasure at the thoughts of all the good she should be enabled to effect through the medium of La Mayeux. She then beckoned Hebe to approach the bed.

About two hours afterwards, Adrienne, dressed with her usual taste and elegance, dismissed her women, and requested to see La Mayeux, whom she always treated with marked deference, and always received alone.

The young sempstress entered, pale, agitated, and trembling, saying, in a voice unsteady from powerful emotion,—

“Ah, mademoiselle, my presentiments were but too well founded! You are betrayed!”

“Of what presentiments are you speaking, my dear girl, and who is betraying me?”

“M. Rodin!” replied La Mayeux.

CHAPTER XXVII.

DOUBTS.

WHEN Mademoiselle de Cardoville heard the accusation made by La Mayeux against Rodin, she looked at the young girl with renewed astonishment.

Before we continue this scene, let us say that La Mayeux had thrown off her old miserable garments, and was dressed in black, with as much simplicity as good taste. This colour of sorrow seemed to announce her renunciation of all human vanities, the eternal mourning of her heart, and the austere duties which her devotion to the misfortunes of others imposed upon her. With this black gown, La Mayeux wore a large falling collar, as white and neat as her little gauze cap with grey ribands, which, exposing her two bands of beautiful brown hair, surrounded her pale face, with its soft blue eyes. Her long and meagre hands, protected from the cold by gloves, were not as they had been, mottled and violet-coloured, but of a whiteness almost transparent.

The agitated features of La Mayeux expressed extreme disquietude, and Mademoiselle de Cardoville, excessively surprised, exclaimed,—

“What do you say?”

“Mademoiselle, M. Rodin is betraying you!”

“He!—Impossible——”

“Ah, mademoiselle, my presentiments did not deceive me.”

“Your presentiments?”

“The first time I was in M. Rodin’s presence I was, in spite of myself, overcome with dread: my heart was pained to the core, and I was frightened for you, mademoiselle.”

“For me!” said Adrienne; “and why not for yourself, my dear friend?”

“I do not know, mademoiselle; but such was my first sensation. And this alarm was so invincible, that in spite of the benevolence which M. Rodin evinced for my sister, he still inspired me with fear.”

“That is very strange! No one understands better than I do the almost irresistible influence of sympathies and aversions; but in this instance — but ——” added Adrienne, after a moment’s consideration, “no matter: tell me how these suspicions have been converted into certainty to-day?”

“Yesterday I went to my sister, Céphyse, with the succour which M. Rodin had given me for her in the name of a charitable person. I did not find Céphyse in the house of the friend who had sheltered her, and I requested the portersess of the house to tell my sister that I would go again this morning. I did so—but I must ask your pardon, mademoiselle, for some necessary details ——”

“Speak — speak, my friend.”

“The young girl who has received my sister at her lodgings,” continued poor La Mayeux, very much embarrassed, casting down her eyes, and blushing deeply, “does not lead the most correct life in the world. An individual whom she has joined in several parties of pleasure, called M. Dumoulin, had told her M. Rodin’s real name, who occupied a small apartment in the same house, where he gave his name as M. Charlemagne.”

“He told us as much at M. Balemier’s; and yesterday, again, referring to the circumstance, he explained to me the necessity he was under, for certain reasons, of having this retired lodging in this remote quarter — reasons which were most satisfactory to me.”

“Well, then, yesterday M. Rodin had a visit there from M. the Abbé d’Aigrigny.”

“The Abbé d’Aigrigny!” cried Mademoiselle de Cardoville.

“Yes, mademoiselle; and he remained for two hours shut up with M. Rodin.”

“My dear girl, they must have deceived you.”

“This is what they told me, mademoiselle. The Abbé d’Aigrigny had called on the previous evening to see M. Rodin, and not finding him, left his name with the portersess, written on paper, as well as these words, ‘I shall call again in two hours.’ The young girl I have named to you, mademoiselle, saw this paper; and as every thing connected with M. Rodin seems very mysterious, she had the curiosity to watch for M. the Abbé d’Aigrigny, in the porter’s lodge, in order to see him, and two hours afterwards he returned, and found M. Rodin within.”

“No, no,” said Adrienne, starting; “it must be impossible — it is an error.”

“I do not think so, mademoiselle; for knowing how important this discovery was, I begged the young girl to give me, as nearly as possible, the Abbé d’Aigrigny’s description.”

“Well?”

“The Abbé d’Aigrigny,” said she, “is about forty years of age, tall and erect, dressed very plainly, but with care; his eyes are grey, very large and penetrating; his eyebrows thick, his hair chestnut, his face very closely shaved, and his whole appearance striking.”

“This is true,” said Adrienne, unable to believe what she heard. “The description is most accurate.”

“Desirous of having the most précise details,” added La Mayeux, “I asked the portersess if M. Rodin and the Abbé d’Aigrigny seemed angry with each other when she saw them quit the house, but she told me ‘No;’ and that the Abbé had only said to M. Rodin, as he left the door of the house, 'To-morrow, I will write to you—that's understood.'

"Is it a dream?" said Adrienne, applying her two hands to her forehead, with a sort of stupor. "I cannot doubt your words, my poor friend, and yet it was M. Rodin who sent you himself to that house to take assistance to your sister, and thus he would have exposed himself to your detecting his secret rendezvous with the Abbé d'Aigrigny! For a traitor, that would be very mal-à-droit."

"True; and I made the same reflection myself;—still the meeting of these two men appeared to me so menacing for you, mademoiselle, that I came here in the greatest possible terror."

Dispositions of extreme frankness are induced with great difficulty to give credit to treachery: the more infamous they are, the more they doubt them. Adrienne's mind was of this class, and, moreover, one of the qualities of that mind was rectitude; and thus, although La Mayeux's recital had made a great impression on her, she remarked:—

"Still, my dear friend, do not let us alarm ourselves unnecessarily,—do not let us believe in evil too suddenly. Let us both try to set ourselves right by reasoning; let us recall the facts. M. Rodin opened Dr. Baleinier's house-door to me, and in my presence made his accusatory charge against the Abbé d'Aigrigny; by his threats he compelled the superior of the convent to restore his daughters to Maréchal Simon; he has, too, discovered Prince Djalma's retreat, and faithfully executed my instructions as to my young relative. Yesterday, only, he gave me some most useful advice. Is not this true?"

"No doubt, mademoiselle."

"Now it may be, looking at things in their worst light, that M. Rodin has some concealed motive, and hopes to be generously rewarded by us, that may be; but up to this moment, his disinterestedness has been most complete."

"That is equally true, mademoiselle," said the poor Mayeux, compelled, like Adrienne, to give way before the evidence of what had been effected.

"Now let us consider the possibility of this treason. To coalesce again with the Abbé d'Aigrigny to betray me?—but betray me, where?—and when?—and on what point? What have I to fear? Is it not, on the contrary, the Abbé d'Aigrigny and Madame de Saint-Dizier, who have to render a fearful account to justice of the ill they have done me?"

"But then, mademoiselle, how can we explain the meeting of the two men who have so many motives to hate each other and keep separate?—may not this conceal some sinister project? And then, mademoiselle, it is not I alone who think so."

"What do you mean?"

"This morning when I came here, I was so much agitated, that Mademoiselle Florine asked me the cause of my trouble, and I know how much she is attached to you."

"It is impossible to be more devoted than she is to me, and, you know, you told me yourself of the service she rendered me during my confinement at Dr. Baleinier's."

"Well, mademoiselle, on my return this morning, thinking it necessary to inform you of all this as speedily as possible, I told Mademoiselle Florine all. Like me, and perhaps worse than myself, she was greatly alarmed at the meeting between Rodin and M. d'Aigrigny. After a moment's reflection, she said, 'I think it is useless to awaken mademoiselle; if she knows this treachery two or three hours hence, it will be all the same, and during that time I may, perhaps, be able to discover something. I have an idea, which I think a very good one — excuse me with mademoiselle, and I will soon return.' Then Mademoiselle Florine sent for a coach, and went out."

"Florine is an excellent girl," said Mademoiselle de Cardoville, with a smile, for the reflection instantly reassured her; "but I think in this case her zeal and warm heart have misled her, as they have you, my good friend. Do you know that we are two giddy-pated damsels, you and I, for not having before thought of a thing which ought at once to have tranquillised us?"

"What is that, mademoiselle?"

"The Abbé d'Aigrigny is now, doubtless, in much dread of M. Rodin, and perhaps went to this retreat to ask his mercy. Do you think with me, that this explanation is not merely satisfactory, but the only one that is reasonable?"

"Perhaps, mademoiselle," said La Mayeux, after a moment's reflection; "yes, perhaps that is probable." Then, after a moment's silence, and as if she had yielded to a conviction superior to all possible reasoning, she exclaimed, "And yet, no, no; — believe me, mademoiselle, they are deceiving you; I feel it; — all appearances are against what I declare — but, believe me, these presentiments are too strong not to be true. And then, indeed, do you not divine fully the most secret instincts of my heart, whilst I do not, in my turn, divine the dangers which threaten you?"

"What do you mean? — what have I divined?" asked Mademoiselle de Cardoville, involuntarily, struck and affected by the tone of La Mayeux, so full of conviction and alarm, as she continued:—

"What have you divined? Alas! all the concealed susceptibilities of an unhappy creature to whom Fate has made a life apart; and you must know very well, that if I have been hitherto silent, it is not from ignorance of what I owe you; for who, indeed, informed you, mademoiselle, that the only means of making me accept your benefits without blushing would be to attach me to you, by giving me functions which would render me useful and serviceable to the unfortunate, whose lot I shared so long? Who informed you, when you wished me henceforth to take my seat at your table as your friend, I, a poor work-girl, in whom you sought to elevate labour, resignation, and probity? Who informed you, when I replied to you by tears of gratitude, and regret, that it was not a false modesty, but the consciousness of my deformity, which made me refuse you? Who informed you that without that, I should have accepted with pride in the name of my sisters of the people? For you replied to me in these touching words, 'I understand your refusal, my friend: it is no false modesty that dictates it, but a sentiment of dignity which I love and respect.' Who still informed you," continued La Mayeux, with increasing animation, "that I should be so happy to find a sacred, solitary retreat in this magnificent mansion, whose splendour dazzles me? Who informed you of that which made you (as you have deigned) to choose as you have done, an apartment by far too handsome, which you have destined for me? Who informed you that without envying the elegance of the charming women who are about you, and whom I already love, because they love you—I should always, by an involuntary comparison, feel embarrassed and ashamed before them? Who informed you that you should always think to send them away when you send for me here, mademoiselle? Yes, who has, in truth, revealed to you all those painful and secret susceptibilities of a position so distressing as mine? Who has revealed these to you? God, no doubt; He who in His infinite greatness, created worlds, and who knows, in His paternal care and wisdom, how to protect and cherish the smallest insect concealed in the grass. And will you not allow the gratitude of a heart which you have divined so well to exalt itself in its turn into a divining of that which may injure you? No, no, mademoiselle, some have the instinct of self-preservation; others, more fortunate still, have the instinct of the preservation of others whom they love and cherish. This instinct God has graciously given to me. You are betrayed, I say—you are betrayed!"

And La Mayeux, with animated look, and her cheeks slightly tinted with the emotion, spoke these last words so energetically, and accompanied them with a gesture so decisive, that Mademoiselle de Cardoville, already shaken by the energetic language of the young girl, now shared her apprehensions.

Moreover, although she had already fully appreciated the superior understanding, the remarkable good sense of this young child of the people, Mademoiselle de Cardoville had never heard La Mayeux express herself with so much eloquence,—an eloquence the more touching, as it had its source in the most noble sentiments. This circumstance added still more to the impression which Adrienne experienced. At the moment when she was about to reply to La Mayeux some one knocked at the door of the salon in which this scene was passing, and Florine entered.

When she saw the disturbed countenance of her chamberwoman Mademoiselle de Cardoville said to her quickly,—

"Well, Florine, what news do you bring? where do you come from, my girl?"

"From the Hôtel de Saint-Dizier, mademoiselle."

"And why did you go there?" inquired Mademoiselle de Cardoville, with surprise.

"This morning, mademoiselle (and Florine pointed to La Mayeux), told me of her suspicions and uneasiness, which I shared. The Abbé d'Aigrigny's visit to M. Rodin appeared to me of most serious import, and I thought that if M. Rodin had been, during the last few hours, to the Hôtel Saint-Dizier, there could be no further doubt as to his treachery."

"Well," said Adrienne, more and more troubled,—“well?"

"Mademoiselle had desired me to attend to the removal of the furniture from the pavilion, and several things still remained. In order to get access to the apartments it was requisite to apply to Madame Grivois, and thus I had an excuse for returning to the Hôtel."

"Well, Florine; well—go on."

"I tried to sound Madame Grivois as to M. Rodin, but it was in vain."

"She mistrusted you, mademoiselle," said La Mayeux; "you might have expected that."

"I asked her," continued Florine, "if M. Rodin had been seen at the Hôtel lately. She replied evasively. Then despairing of learning any thing, I quitted Madame Grivois, and that my visit might not inspire any suspicion, I went to the pavilion, when, as I turned into one of the walks, what should I see a few paces from me, and going towards the small garden-gate, but M. Rodin, who believed, no doubt, that he could go out more privately that way?"

"Mademoiselle! do you hear?" exclaimed La Mayeux, clasping her hands in a supplicating manner. "Surely you will be convinced by evidence."

"He at the Princess de Saint-Dizier's!" cried Mademoiselle de Cardoville, whose look, usually so mild, was now one of severest indignation, adding, in a voice that shook slightly, "Go on, Florine."

"At the sight of M. Rodin I stopped," resumed Florine, "and retreating quickly, I reached the pavilion without being seen, and entered the small passage which looks into the street. The windows look out close to the garden-door. I opened one, and leaving the outer blinds still shut, I saw a hackney-coach, which was awaiting M. Rodin, who, a few minutes afterwards, got into it, saying to the coachman, 'Rue Blanche, No. 39.'"

"The prince's abode!" cried Mademoiselle de Cardoville.

"Yes, mademoiselle."

"And M. Rodin was to have seen him to-day," said Adrienne, reflecting.

"No doubt, if he betrayed you, mademoiselle, but he would also betray the prince, who will become his victim much more easily than yourself."

"Infamous! infamous! infamous!" exclaimed Mademoiselle de Cardoville, rising, and her features contracted by painful anger; "unequalled treachery! This is enough to make me doubt every body,—even to doubt one's self."

"Oh, mademoiselle, it is frightful! is it not?" said La Mayeux, with a shudder.

"But, then, why rescue me and mine? Why denounce the Abbé d'Aigrigny?" inquired Mademoiselle de Cardoville; "really one's senses are disturbed by it. It is an abyss. Oh, what a fearful thing is doubt!"

"As I returned," said Florine, casting a tender and devoted look at her mistress, "I bethought me of a means which would allow mademoiselle to learn what the facts really are, but we have not a moment to lose."

"What do you mean?" inquired Adrienne, looking at Florine in great surprise.

"M. Rodin will be alone with the prince," said Florine.

"Unquestionably," said Adrienne.

"The prince is still in the small apartment which opens into the conservatory, and there he will receive M. Rodin."

"Well, what then?" said Adrienne.

"This conservatory, which I have arranged, as mademoiselle desired, has its only exit by a small door leading to a narrow lane. By this the gardener enters every morning in order that he may not cross the rooms. When he has finished his work he does not return that day."

"What do you mean? What is your plan?" asked Adrienne, looking at Florine, more and more surprised.

"The clumps of trees are so disposed, that I think, when the blind which conceals the glass-door separating the salon from the conservatory, is not lowered, we could, I think, without being seen, approach near enough to overhear what is said in the other room. It was always by this door that I have entered lately to superintend the arrangements. The gardener had a key, and I another. Fortunately I have mine yet, and before the lapse of another hour mademoiselle may learn what ought to be her real opinion of M. Rodin; for if he deceives the prince, he deceives her also."

"What do you mean?" said Mademoiselle de Cardoville.

"Mademoiselle goes this instant with me; well, we reach the door in the lone alley; I enter alone, for precaution's sake, and if the occasion appears favourable, I return ——"

"Espionage!" said Mademoiselle de Cardoville, with hauteur, and interrupting Florine; "can you really think of such a thing?"

"Pardon, mademoiselle," said the young girl, lowering her eyes, with a confused and distressed air; "you have your suspicions, and this appears to me the sole means by which you can confirm or destroy them."

"Sink so low as go and listen to a conversation? Never!" replied Adrienne.

"Mademoiselle," said La Mayeux suddenly, after having been pensive for a long time, "allow me to tell you that Mademoiselle Florine is right; the means are painful, but that alone can determine you, perhaps for ever, as to M. Rodin; and then, too, in spite of the evidence of facts,—in spite of almost the certainty of my presentiments, the most guilty appearances may be deceitful. It was I who first accused M. Rodin to you, and I should not forgive myself all my life if I have wrongfully charged him. Unquestionably it is as you say, mademoiselle, most painful to spy,—to listen,—and to overhear a conversation ——"

Then making a violent and painful effort over herself, La Mayeux added, whilst she endeavoured to restrain the tears of shame which veiled her eyes:—

"Still as it, perhaps, may save you, mademoiselle; for if it be a treachery, the future is most fearful—I will go, if you please, in your place—to ——"

"Not another word, I entreat," cried Mademoiselle de Cardoville, interrupting La Mayeux. "I couldn't allow you to do—you, my poor friend, and in my interest so deeply—what appears to me degrading! Never!"

Then addressing Florine,—

"Go and tell M. de Bonneville to have the carriage got ready this moment."

"You consent, then, to go?" exclaimed Florine, clasping her hands, unable to repress her joy, and her eyes became moist with tears.

"Yes—I consent," replied Adrienne, in a voice of deep emotion; "it is a war—a war to the knife, that they seek to direct against me, and I must prepare for the struggle. It would, indeed, be weakness and self-deceit not to put myself on my guard. No doubt the step is most repugnant, and costs me deeply, but it is the only means of terminating suspicions, which would be a constant torment to me; and, perhaps, prevent greater mischiefs. Then, for very important reasons, this conversation with M. Rodin and Prince Djalma may be doubly decisive for me as to the confidence or the inexorable hatred I shall have for M. Rodin. So, quick, Florine,—a cloak, a bonnet, and my carriage,—you shall accompany me. You, my friend, await me here, I request of you," she added, addressing La Mayeux.

* * * * *

Half-an-hour after this conversation Adrienne's carriage stopped, as we have described, at the small garden-gate in the Rue Blanche.

Florine entered the conservatory, and returned soon, saying to her mistress,—

"The blind is down, mademoiselle, and M. Rodin has just entered the prince's apartment."

Mademoiselle de Cardoville was then present (though unseen) at the following scene which passed between Rodin and Djalma.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

THE LETTER.

SOME minutes before the arrival of Mademoiselle de Cardoville in the conservatory Rodin had been introduced by Faringhea to the prince, who, still under the intense excitement in which the words of the Métis had plunged him, had not perceived the entrance of the Jesuit.

Rodin, surprised at the emotion visible in Djalma's features, and his almost wild manner, made an interrogative sign to Faringhea, who replied, without observation from Djalma, and with signs thus:—after having placed his forefinger on his heart and his forehead, he pointed with his finger to the burning brasier, which was alight in the fire-place.

This pantomime signified that the head and heart of Djalma were in flames.

Rodin, doubtless, understood, for an imperceptible smile of satisfaction played on his corpse-like lips, and he said, in a low voice to Faringhea,—

"I wish to be alone with the prince—pull down the blind, and see that no one interrupts us."

The Métis bowed, then touching a spring placed near the plate-glass door, it retreated into the thickness of the wall so that the blind could fall; then, again bowing, the Métis left the apartment. It was a short time after his departure that Mademoiselle de Cardoville and Florine reached the conservatory, which was only separated from the apartment in which Djalma was by the transparent thickness of the white silk blind, worked with large coloured birds.

The noise of the door which Faringhea shut as he went out seemed to recall the young Indian to himself: his features, still slightly animated, had resumed their habitual expression of calm and sweetness. He started, passed his hands over his forehead, looked about him, as if he was recovering from a deep reverie, then advancing towards Rodin with an air at once respectful and embarrassed, he said to him, employing an appellation habitually used in his country to old men,—

“Pardon, my father.”

And then, according to the custom, so full of deference of young persons towards the old, he sought to take Rodin's hand and carry it to his lips, but the Jesuit refused this homage by retreating a few steps.

“And, for what do you ask pardon, my dear prince?” said he to Djalma.

“I was dreaming when you came in, and did not instantly address you. Again, pardon, father.”

“And again, I pardon you, my dear prince; but let us talk a little, if you will; resume your place on the sofa and your pipe, if you will.”

But Djalma, instead of complying with Rodin's invitation, and stretching himself on the divan, as was usual with him, seated himself in an arm-chair, in spite of the old man with the good heart, as he called the Jesuit.

“Really your ceremony makes one quite uncomfortable, my dear prince,” said Rodin to him. “You are here in your own house in the bosom of India, or at least we desire that you should think you are there.”

“Many things here recall my country to me,” said Djalma, in a low and gentle voice. “Your kindnesses remind me of my father and of him who has replaced him,” added the Indian, thinking of Maréchal Simon, of whose arrival he had been for certain reasons kept in ignorance up to that time.

After a moment's silence, he replied in a tone of pleasure, and extending his hand to Rodin,—

“You are here, and I am happy.”

“I comprehend your joy, my dear prince, for I come to release you from your imprisonment, to open your cage. I had begged you to submit to this brief voluntary confinement, which was absolutely necessary for your interest.”

“Then to-morrow I may go out?”

“This very day, my dear prince.”

The young Indian reflected for an instant, and then said,—

“I have friends, since I am here in this palace which does not belong to me?”

“Yes, you have friends,—excellent friends,” replied Rodin.

At these words Djalma's countenance seemed to expand more fully, the noblest sentiments were suddenly imprinted on his varying and expressive physiognomy: his large black eyes became slightly moistened, and, after a short silence, he rose, saying to Rodin with a tremulous voice,—

"Come!"

"Where, my dear prince?" inquired the other, greatly surprised.

"To thank my friends. I have waited three days—it is a long time."

"Permit me, my dear prince—permit me—I have a great deal to say to you on this point—be so good as resume your seat."

Djalma seated himself quietly in his arm-chair.

Rodin continued,—

"It is true—you have friends, or rather you have a friend—friends are very rare."

"But you?"

"True, true—you have two friends, my dear prince: me whom you know, and another whom you do not know, and who desires to remain unknown to you."

"Wherefore?"

"Wherefore?" replied Rodin, after a short embarrassment, "because the happiness which he experiences in giving you proofs of his friendship—because his tranquillity—are the price of this mystery."

"Why should he who does good conceal himself?"

"Sometimes to conceal the good he does, my dear prince."

"I profit by this friendship—wherefore should he conceal himself from me?"

The repeated wherefores of the young Indian seemed rather to perplex Rodin, who, nevertheless, replied,—

"I have told you, my dear prince, that your secret friend would, perhaps, have his tranquillity compromised if he were known."

"If he were known for my friend?"

"Precisely so, dear prince."

Djalma's features assumed an expression of melancholy dignity; he raised his head disdainfully, and said, in a stern and haughty voice,—

"Since this friend conceals himself, it is he who blushes for me, or I who ought to blush for him—I do not accept hospitality but from persons of whom I am worthy, or who are worthy of me—I leave this house."

And as he said this, Djalma rose so resolutely that Rodin exclaimed,—

"But listen to me, then, my dear prince—you are, allow me to say it, remarkably hasty, impetuous. Although we have endeavoured to recall to you your beautiful country, we are here in the heart of Europe, the heart of France, the heart of Paris: this consideration ought somewhat to modify your mode of viewing things, and I entreat you to listen to me."

In spite of Djalma's complete ignorance of certain social conventions, he had too much good sense, too much right feeling, not to be amenable to reason when it appeared to him to be reason, and Rodin's words calmed him. With that ingenuous modesty usually inherent in natures full of strength and generosity, he replied softly,—

"Father, you are right; I am not in my own country: here habits are different. I will reflect on this."

Despite his cunning and plasticity, Rodin found himself some time defeated by the uncultivated turns of mind and the unforeseen ideas of the young Indian. He saw him now, to his great surprise, remain pensive for some minutes; after which Djalma continued, in a tone calm but full of conviction,—

"I have obeyed you, my father; I have reflected."

"Well, my dear prince?"

"In no country in the world, under no pretext whatsoever, ought a man of honour, who has friendship for a man of honour, to conceal it."

"But if it is dangerous for him to avow this friendship?" said Rodin, extremely uneasy at the turn which the conversation was taking.

Djalma looked at the Jesuit with disdainful astonishment, and made no reply.

"I understand your silence, my dear prince, a brave man should face danger—true; but if it were you that the danger threatened, in case this friendship were discovered, would not this man of honour be excusable, even praiseworthy, if he desired to rest unknown?"

"I will accept nothing from a friend who believes me capable of denying him through cowardice."

"Dear prince, hear me."

"Adieu, father."

"Reflect."

"I have said!" added Djalma, in a brief and almost kingly tone, and advancing towards the door.

"Eh! but, indeed, suppose it were a female who was the party concerned!" exclaimed Rodin, driven to his wits' end, and hastening towards him, for he was really alarmed to see Djalma thus determined to quit the house, and so completely overturn all his projects.

At these last words of Rodin, the Indian stopped abruptly.

"A female?" said he, starting and turning crimson; "is there a female concerned?"

"Yes, yes, there is a female concerned," answered Rodin; "do you now understand her reserve and the secrecy with which she is obliged to envelope those proofs of affection which she is desirous of giving you?"

"A female?" repeated Djalma, in a tremulous voice, and clasping his hands with fervour; and his fine features expressed his deep internal feeling. "A female?" he repeated, "a Parisian?"

"Yes, my dear prince, since you compel me to this indiscretion, I must own the fact to you—it is—it concerns a venerable Parisian—a worthy matron—virtue itself—and whose advanced years call for all your respect."

"Is she very aged?" inquired poor Djalma, whose charming vision had melted suddenly

"Into air, into thin air."

"Some years my senior," replied Rodin, with an ironical smile, expecting to see the young man express a kind of comic spite or angry regret. He did neither.

To the amorous, impassioned enthusiasm, which had for an instant expanded over the features of the prince, succeeded a respectful and tender expression ; he looked at Rodin with deep emotion, and said to him in soft accents,—

“ This female is then to me as a mother ? ”

It is impossible to depict the charm (so pious, melancholy, and tender) with which the Indian uttered to him the words “ a mother ! ”

“ Just so, dear prince, this respectable lady seeks to be a mother to you ; but I cannot reveal to you the cause of the affection which she bears you ; only believe me this affection is sincere : the cause of it is honourable, and if I do not reveal this secret, it is because with us the secrets of all women, young or old, are sacred.”

“ That is just, and her secret shall be sacred for me ; without seeing her I will love her with respect, as we love God without seeing Him.”

“ Now, dear prince, let me tell you the intentions of your maternal friend. This house will always remain at your disposal, if you so please. The French servants, a carriage and horses, will be at your orders : all the expenses of your establishment will be paid. Then, as a son of a king ought to live royally, I have left in the next apartment a casket containing five hundred louis. Every month a like sum will be handed to you. If that is not sufficient for what we call your private expenses, you must tell me, and I will increase it.”

Djalma made a movement, and Rodin hastened to add,—

“ I must tell you, also, my dear prince that your delicacy may rest perfectly content. In the first place, one accepts of any and every thing from a mother ; then, as in three months hence, you will be put in possession of an enormous inheritance, it will be easy for you, if this obligation weighs upon you (at the utmost the sum can scarcely reach four or five thousand louis), it will be easy for you to repay these advances ; therefore do not economise or spare, satisfy all your fancies. It is wished that you should appear in the leading ranks of Parisian fashion as the son of a king, surnamed the Father of the Generous, should do. Thus, once again, I entreat you, do not be restrained by any false delicacy ; and, if this sum is not sufficient ——”

“ I will ask for more ; my mother is right,—a king's son should live like a king.”

Such was the Indian's reply in perfect simplicity, and without appearing the least astonished in the world at these superb offers ; and yet it was very natural. Djalma would have done what was done for him ; for we know what are the traditions of the prodigal magnificence and splendid hospitality of Indian princes. Djalma had been as deeply excited as grateful when he learned that a female loved him with maternal affection. As to the luxury with which she desired to enrich him, he accepted it without astonishment and without scruple.

This resignation was another contre temps for Rodin who had prepared several excellent arguments to induce the prince to accept.

“ Well, then, this is all clearly understood, my dear prince,” said the Jesuit. “ Now, as it is necessary that you should see the world, and enter it by the best gate, as we say, why, one of the friends of your maternal protectress, M. le Comte de Montbron, an old man full of experience, and belonging to the highest society, will present you in the principal circles of Paris ——”

“ Why do not you present me, father ? ”

"Alas, my dear prince, look at me, and tell me if I could do such a thing. No, no, I live alone and in retirement. And, besides," added Rodin, after a brief silence, and fixing on the young prince a penetrating, searching, and inquisitive look, as if he would have submitted him to a kind of experiment by the following words, "and then, you see, M. de Montbron would be even better than me, in the world with which he mixes, to enlighten you as to the snares that may be spread for you. For, if you have friends, you have also enemies you know,—base enemies, who have abused your confidence in an infamous manner and have ill-used you. And, as unfortunately their power is equal to their wickedness, it might be, perhaps, prudent to try and avoid them,—to fly them instead of resisting them face to face."

At the recollection of his enemies, at the thought of flying from them, Djalma shook from head to foot, his features became suddenly of a livid paleness, his eyes, which were widely opened, and whose pupils were thus encircled with white, sparkled with dark fire. Never did disdain, hatred, and the thirst of vengeance, light up a human countenance more terribly. His upper lip as red as blood shewed his small, white, and close-set teeth, whilst it curled up convulsively, and gave his face just now so charming an expression of ferocity, so brutal that Rodin rose from his chair and cried,—

"What ails you, prince? You frighten me."

Djalma made no reply. Half leaning on his seat, his two hands clenched with rage and locked in each other, he seemed to fasten himself to one of the arms of his chair for fear of giving way to the excess of his fearful rage. At this moment it chanced that the amber top of his houka pipe rolled under his feet, and such was the violent tension which contracted all the Indian's nerves, that in spite of his youthful and slender appearance, such was his strength that with one motion of his foot he pulverised the amber to atoms notwithstanding its excessive hardness.

"In the name of Heaven, prince, what ails you?" inquired Rodin.

"Thus will I crush my base enemies!" exclaimed Djalma, with a threatening and inflamed look.

Then, as if these words had consummated his rage, he bounded from his seat, and then, with haggard eyes, paced up and down and about the apartment for several seconds with rapid strides as if he were seeking some sort of weapon, uttering from time to time a sort of hoarse cry, which he tried to stifle by pressing his clenched fists against his mouth whilst his jaws quivered convulsively. It was the impotent rage of a wild beast thirsting for carnage.

The young Indian was thus of grand and savage beauty: it was evident that those divine instincts of sanguinary ardour and blind intrepidity, raised to such a pitch by the horror of treachery and cowardice, when directed to war or those giant hunts of India more slaughtering than even a battle itself, would make of Djalma what he was—a hero!

Rodin gazed with deep and sinister delight at the maddened impetuosity of the young Indian who, under certain circumstances, would assuredly give way to these terrible explosions.

Suddenly, to the great surprise of the Jesuit, this tempest calmed.

Djalma's fury was suddenly appeased, because reflection told him how vain was this display. Then ashamed of his childish temper, he cast down his eyes. His features remained pale and sombre; and, then, with calmness, the more to be dreaded after the violent gust of passion to which he had given way, he said to Rodin,—

"Father, to-day you must lead me to the face of my enemies."

"For what, my dear prince, what would you?"

"Kill these cowards."

"Kill them! You do not think of such a thing?"

"Faringhea will aid me."

"Once again, reflect that you are not here on the banks of the Ganges, where a man slays his enemy as he would a tiger in the chase."

"We fight with a noble foe; we kill a traitor like an accursed dog," replied Djalma with as much conviction as calmness.

"Ah, prince, you whose father was called the Father of the Generous!" said Rodin, in a serious tone, "what joy shall you find in striking creatures as cowardly as they are wicked?"

"To destroy what is dangerous is a duty."

"But, then, prince, revenge!"

"I do not revenge myself on a serpent," said the prince, with bitter haughtiness, "I crush it!"

"But, my dear prince, here we do not get rid of our enemies in this way; if we have to complain of them——"

"Women and children complain," said Djalma, interrupting Rodin, "men strike."

"Yes, on the banks of the Ganges, my dear prince, but not here. Here society takes your cause in hand, examines it, judges it, and, if needs be, punishes it."

"In my own offences I am judge and executioner."

"I pray of you to listen to me. You have escaped the odious snares of your enemies, have you not? Well, suppose that has been effected by the devotedness of the venerable female who has for you the tenderness of a mother: now, if she asked you to pardon them, she who has saved you from them, what should you do?"

The Indian bowed his head, and remained for some moments without making any reply.

Profiting by his hesitation Rodin continued,—

"I might say to you, prince, I know your enemies, but, in the fear of seeing you commit some terrible imprudence, I will conceal their names from you for ever. Well, now I swear to you that if the estimable person who loves you as a son, finds it just and useful that I should tell you their names, I would tell you. But until she has so empowered me, I shall be silent."

Djalma looked at Rodin with a sombre and angry air.

At this moment Faringhea entered, and said to Rodin,—

"A man has been to your house to take a letter to you; they told him that you were here, and he has come. Must I take the letter? he says it comes from M. l'Abbé d'Aigrigny."

"Certainly," said Rodin; then he added, "that is, with the prince's permission?"

Djalma made a sign with his head. Faringhea went out.

"You will excuse me, dear prince; I expected this morning a very important letter, and as it was delayed, being unwilling to fail in coming here, I left word at home that it should be forwarded to me here."

Some instants afterwards Faringhea returned with a letter, which he handed to Rodin, after which the Métis left the apartment.

CHAPTER XXIX.

ADRIENNE AND DJALMA.

As soon as Faringhea had quitted the apartment, Rodin took the letter from the Abbé d'Aigrigny in one hand, while with the other he appeared searching for something, first in the side pocket of his great-coat, then in the hinder one, next in the pocket of his trousers; but not discovering what he sought, laid the letter upon the threadbare knee of his old black trousers, while both hands were busily occupied in feeling in all directions for what he required, while his manner indicated equal vexation and uneasiness.

All these cleverly enacted pantomimic gestures were crowned by the exclamation of "God bless me, how very unfortunate!"

"What is the matter?" inquired Djalma, roused from the reverie into which he had been for several minutes plunged.

"My dear prince," replied Rodin, "the most trifling and common occurrence has befallen me, and yet it is a matter of serious annoyance and inconvenience under present circumstances. The fact is, I have either lost or forgotten my spectacles, and what with the imperfect light here, and the wretched state to which labour and old age have reduced my sight, I cannot manage to read this letter, which is of the first importance, for I am expected to return an answer at once prompt, decisive, and categorical,—an affirmative or negative—and, unfortunately, time presses—it is most unfortunate! If, indeed," added Rodin, laying considerable emphasis on his words, without however looking at Djalma, but rather seeking to attract his attention,— "if, indeed, there were any person who could read it for me—but, no! no! that is out of the question—no one can aid me!"

"Father," said Djalma, kindly, "will you allow me to read it for you? be assured that directly I have done so, I shall forget every word that it contains."

"You!" exclaimed Rodin, as though the proposition of the young Indian had been alike preposterous and dangerous. "Oh! dear no—impossible, prince! You read this letter?—you?"

"I beg of you to pardon me for having proposed to do so," said Djalma, mildly.

"And yet," resumed Rodin, after a brief consideration, and as though speaking to himself, "why should I not accept——" then addressing Djalma, he added, "Would you really have the goodness to read it for me, my dear prince? I should not have ventured to ask such a thing, but since you have had the complaisance to propose rendering me this great service, I cannot bring myself to refuse it, in the great emergency in which I am placed."

So saying, Rodin gave the open letter to Djalma, who, in a clear and distinct voice, read as follows:—

"Your visit of this morning to the Hôtel Saint Dizier, according to the account I have received of it, can only be considered as a fresh aggression on your part. You will find herein the last proposition that will be made you. It may possibly fail equally with the arrangement I endeavoured to persuade you to enter into when I called upon you yesterday in the Rue Clovis.

"After the long and painful explanation which then took place, I promised to write to you; and by way of keeping my promise, I now send you my ultimatum; and, first, beware how you proceed.

"Take care. If you persist in maintaining an unequal struggle, you will expose yourself even to the scorn and hatred of those you foolishly seek to protect. There are a thousand ways of injuring you for ever in their estimation by enlightening them on your schemes, and of convincing them you have been concerned in the conspiracy against them, which you now pretend to unveil, and that your motives, in feigning to be their friend, arise not from generosity, but cupidity."

Although Djalma had the instinctive delicacy to perceive the impropriety of questioning Rodin respecting this letter, yet he involuntarily turned an inquiring look towards the Jesuit, as he pronounced these last words.

"Yes, my dear prince," said Rodin, pointing to his old and faded garments; "they accuse a poor old man like me of being actuated by mercenary and interested motives in the little good I am enabled to do."

"And who are your protégés?"

"Who are they?" repeated Rodin, with feigned hesitation, as if embarrassed how to reply; "who are they? Oh, I'll tell you! Poor, unfortunate, and destitute beings, now in poverty and distress, but entitled to considerable wealth, for which they are now contending in a lawsuit, but are threatened with utter annihilation by some all-powerful personages, who, however, are happily sufficiently well known to me to enable me to unmask their villanous designs, and to turn my knowledge to the advantage of my poor protégés; for poor and humble myself, it follows, as a matter of course, I should espouse the cause of those who, like me, are miserable and obscure. But let me beg of you to continue reading."

Djalma resumed,—

"You have, therefore, every thing to fear in acting hostilely towards us, and nothing to hope for in espousing the part of those you call your friends, but who may be more justly styled your dupes; for as your disinterestedness would, if real, be inexplicable, so is it beyond a doubt that it is merely assumed, to conceal your own greedy and avaricious views. And even viewing it in this light, we are disposed to offer you an ample compensation, with the additional recommendation of our offers being tangible and of immediate fulfilment, while the hopes you may have built upon, from the gratitude of your friends, are altogether vague and uncertain. To come to the point, the following are the terms to which you are required to accede:—You shall quit Paris before twelve o'clock to-night at the very latest, and bind yourself not to return for six months."

Unable to restrain a movement of surprise, Djalma again looked earnestly at Rodin.

"To be sure," said the latter, "the suit of my poor protégés would be decided before then; and, by sending me out of the way, they deprive them of my watchful superintendence and counsel. Does not this strike you, my dear prince?" said Rodin, with the most bitter indignation. "But have the kindness to continue, and pardon me for having interrupted you; but such unblushing assurance was too much for me."

Djalma read as follows:—

"And that we may be assured of your absence from Paris during the six months specified, you will be required to go to the houses of persons known to us in Germany, who will shew you every attention, but with whom you must necessarily abide until the prescribed term shall have expired."

"Yes!" observed Rodin, contemptuously, "they offer me a voluntary prison."

"Upon your acceptance of these conditions you will receive a monthly allowance, from the date of your departure from Paris, of 10,000 francs, and 20,000 more at the termination of the six months. This will be fully secured to you, and at the expiration of the above-named period, a situation, both honourable and independent, will be provided for you."

Djalma having paused from the excess of his involuntary indignation, Rodin exclaimed,—

"Let me request of you to proceed. My dear prince, pray read the conclusion of this epistle; it will serve to give you some idea of what is passing in the very bosom of civilisation."

Djalma resumed,—

"You are sufficiently aware of the state of things, and also of our position to be quite assured that, in removing you to a distance, our only aim is to be freed from an opponent who is rather annoying than dangerous. Be not blinded by your former success. The consequences of your denunciation against me are entirely put an end to, because the charge preferred by you was palpably calumnious, and even the magistrate before whom you preferred it now deeply laments his undue partiality in listening to your fabricated tale. You are at liberty to make what use you please of this letter. We know full well what we have said, how we have written, and to whom such writing is addressed. You will receive this letter at three o'clock. If, by the expiration of an hour, we have not your full and unequivocal assent to all herein proposed, written, and subscribed by your own hand at the bottom of this letter, war begins again between us, and from this very night."

The letter concluded, Djalma looked towards Rodin, who said,—

"Give me leave to call Faringhea."

So saying, he touched the bell, which had scarcely sounded ere the Métis appeared.

Rodin receiving the letter from the hands of Djalma, first tore it in half, then rolling it up in a kind of ball, he handed it to the Métis, saying,—

"You will give this paper to the person who waits, and tell him that is my only reply to its base and insolent contents! You understand—its base and insolent contents!"

"I will faithfully deliver your words," replied the Métis, and quitted the room.

"This may be a dangerous warfare for you, my father," said the Indian, with sympathising interest.

"I doubt not it will prove so, my dear prince; but I do not follow your example—seek to kill my enemies, because they are base and cowardly; but I wage war with them, sheltered by the protecting ægis of the law. Follow my example;" then, perceiving the features of Djalma again overcast, Rodin added, "I am wrong. I will not again intrude my advice upon this subject. Promise me only to refer the question to the judgment of your excellent maternal protectress, whom I shall see to-morrow. And then, if she consents, I will tell you the name of your enemies, but not otherwise."

"And is this unknown friend—this second mother," cried Djalma, "a person to whose decision I may venture to leave so important a matter?"

"Is she?" exclaimed Rodin, clasping his hands, and assuming an appearance of rapidly increasing enthusiasm,—"Is she? Nay, the universe contains not a more noble, generous, or exalted mind, than that which actuates every thought of your admirable protectress; and sure I am, that were you really her son, whom she loved with all the passionate tenderness of maternal affection, and if it became a question whether you should choose between death and cowardice, she would say, 'Die, my son! I can at least die with you!'"

"Oh, noble lady!" exclaimed Djalma, with enthusiastic ardour; "such was my own mother!"

"But for your protectress," continued Rodin, still increasing in energetic warmth, and contriving to approach nearer and nearer to the silken blind which masked the green-house, towards which he cast a sidelong and uneasy glance, "how shall I attempt to give you any adequate idea of her excellence? Picture to yourself the living personification of honour, courage, and goodness—of undeviating truth—such a mixture, indeed, of the rarest virtues as might be expected to be found in the noblest, bravest-hearted man, united with the graceful pride of one who not only has never sullied her lips by falsehood, but has never even deigned to conceal a thought, and who would infinitely prefer death to being compelled to employ the many petty artifices, deceptions, and concealments, almost necessarily forced upon females by reason of their very position in social life."

It would be difficult, if not impossible, to express the admiration which glowed in the features of Djalma as he listened to this animated description; his eyes sparkled, his cheeks were flushed, and his heart beat high with enthusiastic delight.

"Noble youth!" cried Rodin, taking another step towards the blind: "it gratifies me thus to see your ardent feelings depicted on your expressive countenance, while I thus speak of your unknown protectress. Ah, trust me, she well deserves that almost religious adoration with which we regard all great and surpassingly gifted persons."

"I feel assured of it!" exclaimed Djalma, with much excitement; "I know by the throbbings of my heart, which bounds with deep and admiring gratitude! Still, also, am I lost in surprise; for my mother is no more, and yet another female of such rare virtues lives to adorn the earth!"

"She does; for the consolation of the afflicted—to be the pride and ornament of her sex—to teach the world to worship truth, persecute vice, she is permitted to exist. Never has falsehood or artifice tarnished the pure brightness of her upright mind, stainless and unsullied as the sword of a brave and gallant knight. Only a few days since, this adorable woman made use of an expression I shall remember to the last hour of my life: 'Sir,' said she, 'directly I have cause to suspect any person whom I either love or esteem——'"

Rodin was prevented from completing his sentence, the blind so violently shaken from without, that its spring broke, ran suddenly up, and, to the almost speechless astonishment of Djalma, revealed the form of Mademoiselle de Cardoville. The covering had fallen from the shoulders of Adrienne, and during the violence of her exertions to reach the blind, her hat, the strings of which were not tied, had dropped to the ground.

Having so hastily and unexpectedly quitted her own house, Adrienne had merely thrown a cloak over the elegant and tasteful costume she frequently wore when at home, and so radiant with beauty did she appear among the blooming plants and green foliage by which she was surrounded, that Djalma believed himself under the influence of a dream.

With distended gaze, clasped hands, and bending forwards as though in act of prayer, he remained transfixed with admiration. Mademoiselle de Cardoville, evidently much agitated, her cheeks tinged with a brighter hue than ordinary, made no attempt to enter the salon, but remained motionless at the entrance to the green-house. All this had taken place in less time than is required to describe it, and scarcely had the blind sprang up than Rodin, with well-feigned surprise, exclaimed,—

"You here, mademoiselle?"

"Yes," said Adrienne, in a tremulous voice; "I come to complete the sentence you had begun. I once told you, that when any doubt arose in my mind as to the good faith of a person, I always made it a practice to acquaint the suspected individual, without reserve, of what was passing in my mind; yet I have failed in this act of justice towards you. I was here as a spy upon your proceedings, when your reply to the letter of the Abbé d'Aigrigny afforded me another proof of your sincerity and devotion. I suspected your integrity at the very moment when you were asserting my truth and candour. For the first time in my life I have stooped to artifice. This weakness well deserves its punishment, that punishment I now endure from the reproaches of my own conscience. It calls for reparation, that I now make—for apologies, I here tender them.” Then addressing Djalma, she added, “At present, prince, secrecy is no longer possible. Allow me to introduce myself as Mademoiselle de Cardoville, your relative, and to hope that you will accept from a sister the same hospitality you would have accepted from a mother.”

ADRIENNE AND DJALMA

But Djalma answered not. Plunged in ecstatic contemplation of a creature more dazzlingly lovely than even his wildest dreams had portrayed, he experienced a species of delirium which, paralysing both thought and reflection, appeared to concentrate his whole being in the one sense of seeing; and in the same manner as the feverish patient seeks to quench his unextinguishable thirst by long and repeated draughts of the pure element, which but seems to add fresh fire, so did the ardent and riveted gaze of the young Indian appear to draw in, with devouring eagerness, the absorbing delight of feasting his eyes upon so rare and perfect a specimen of beauty.

And, indeed, two more exquisite models of the divine creation could never be seen. Adrienne and Djalma were the living types of perfected beauty, as regarded their respective sexes. There appeared a something both providential and predestined in the meeting of these two beings so fresh in buoyant youth and vigour—so full of warm and generous impulses—so heroically proud and daring; and who, strange to say, knew each other's moral value even before they had met; for, if the words of Rodin had kindled in the heart of Djalma an admiration, as sudden as it was deep and enthusiastic, for the noble qualities and rare endowments of that unknown benefactor, whom he now found to be no other than Mademoiselle de Cardoville herself, so had the latter, in her turn, been both moved, touched, and terrified during the conversation she had just overheard between Rodin and Djalma, in the course of which the latter had, by degrees, exposed, not only the delicacy and nobleness of his sentiments and the excellency of his heart, but also the violent impetuosity of his character; neither had she been able to restrain a movement of surprise, almost amounting to admiration, at the sight of the uncommon beauty of the young prince, which was quickly followed by a feeling at once strange and painful—a sort of electric shock, which appeared to pass throughout her whole frame as her eyes encountered the warm thrilling gaze of the enraptured Indian.

Deeply moved and agitated by the powerful impression she had received, Adrienne sought to conceal the nature of her emotion by addressing Rodin, and soliciting his pardon for having suspected him; but the prolonged silence of the prince gave additional strength to the embarrassment Adrienne was striving to conceal. Raising her eyes a second time towards Djalma, as though to ask for his reply to her sisterly offers of service, she encountered the fixed and ardent gaze of the Indian riveted on her countenance with an almost wildness of expression, and such an intensity of admiration, as caused her to cast down her looks with mingled terror, sadness, and wounded pride, and doubly to congratulate herself on having foreseen the absolute necessity for keeping the prince from her presence. So great was the feeling of alarm and inquietude, occasioned by his undisguised ardour and impetuosity, that she hastened to put an end to it, as well as to her own unpleasant position, by saying to Rodin, in a low and trembling voice,—

"I pray of you, sir, to speak to the prince, and repeat to him my offers of hospitality and sisterly service, for myself I cannot remain here longer."

So speaking, Adrienne moved for the purpose of rejoining Florine, but with a sudden bound the young Indian sprung forward as a tiger darts upon the prey about to be snatched from him. Terrified at the wild and ardent expression which lit up the features of the young Indian, Adrienne drew back with sudden terror, uttering a loud cry as she did so.

At this sound Djalma recovered himself and recalled all that had occurred; as the full particulars rose to his mind's view his eyes filled with tears of shame and regret for his past violence, his countenance was marked with the deepest, yet most gentle and melancholy contrition, while, in despairing sorrow, he threw himself on his knees before Adrienne, and, raising his clasped hands towards her, cried in a voice, at once mournfully sweet, supplicating, and timid,—

"Oh, stay! I beseech you, stay!—Oh, do not leave me! 'tis so long since I have been awaiting you."

To this prayer, uttered with all the timid persuasiveness of a child, but with a resignation which contrasted powerfully with the almost savage impetuosity which had so greatly alarmed Adrienne not long before; she replied, while making signs to Florine to expedite their departure,—

"Prince, it is quite impossible for me to remain here longer."

"But you will return?" said Djalma, making a violent effort to restrain his almost overpowering emotion. "I shall again be permitted to behold you?"

"Never! never!" cried Mademoiselle de Cardoville, in a faint voice.

Then profiting by the consternation into which her reply had thrown the prince, Adrienne quickly disappeared behind a large clump of plants and quitted the greenhouse.

At the moment, when Florine, hastening after her mistress, was compelled to pass by Rodin, the latter said, in a low and hurried tone,—

"We must finish with La Mayeux to-morrow."

Florine shuddered as though the hand of death were on her; but without making any reply she also disappeared behind the shrubs.

Overcome with the intensity of his feelings Djalma still remained kneeling as Adrienne had left him, his head drooping on his breast, while his faultless features, in lieu of rage or impatience, were marked only by an expression of the deepest sorrow and perplexity, while large tears trickled silently down his cheeks.

As Rodin approached him he rose, but, trembling so violently, that he could barely totter into the adjoining room, where, falling on the divan, he covered his face with his hands.

Drawing near to him with a tender and commiserating air Rodin murmured forth,—

"Alas, I dread this!—I was anxious to conceal from you the name of your benefactress; nay, I even told you she was old. Can you guess why, my dear prince?"

Djalma made no reply, but, letting fall his hands, turned towards Rodin, his face still bathed in tears.

"Because I was aware of the surpassing loveliness of Mademoiselle de Cardoville, and also how quickly young persons of your age are fascinated by beauty; and," pursued Rodin, "I wished, my dear prince, to spare you the painful trial to your feelings, since your young and charming protectress is tenderly attached to a young and handsome individual of this city."

At these words Djalma pressed both hands on his heart, as though to still some severe pain, uttered a wild and frantic cry; then his head fell back, he sunk senseless on the divan.

Rodin eyed him for several moments with cool disregard; then preparing to go, he said, while brushing his old hat with the sleeve of his greasy threadbare coat,—

"Oh, that stings deep, does it?"

CHAPTER XXX.

CONFIDENCES AND COUNSELS.

IT was night. Nine o'clock had just struck.

It was on the evening of the day when Mademoiselle de Cardoville had, for the first time, seen Djalma, Florine, pale, agitated, and trembling, had just entered with a light in her hand into a sleeping apartment, furnished with much simplicity, but yet very comfortable.

This room was one of those which La Mayeux occupied at Adrienne's house. It was on the ground-floor, and had two entrances, one opened on the garden, and the other into the court-yard; and it was on this side that persons came who were desirous of seeing La Mayeux to obtain alms or assistance. A meeting-room and a receiving-room were the other apartments, which were completed by the bedroom, into which Florine had just entered, with a disturbed and almost frightened air, hardly touching the carpet with the points of her satin shoes, and holding her breath and listening to every sound.

Placing her light on the mantelpiece, the chambermaid, after a hasty glance around the chamber, went towards a mahogany bureau surrounded by a very pretty bookcase, well filled. The key was in the drawers—all three of which Florine searched. They contained various petitions for aid, and some notes in La Mayeux's hand-writing. What Florine was seeking for was not there. A case containing three smaller drawers separated the flap of table from the bookcase, and these were also examined, but also to no purpose. Florine made a gesture of vexation, looked about her, listened again with anxiety, and then observing a small cupboard, made there also fresh but unavailing search,

At the foot of the bed was a small door leading to a large dressing room, into which Florine entered, and at first sought uselessly in a large closet, in which hung several black dresses newly made for La Mayeux by Mademoiselle de Cardoville's order. Seeing on the ground, at the extremity of this cupboard, and half hidden by a cloak, an old trunk, Florine hastily opened it, and found therein, very carefully folded up, the miserable worn-out garments in which La Mayeux was clad when she had entered this abode of wealth and splendour.

Florine started—an involuntary emotion contracted her features, but, reflecting that she must not let her heart soften, but obey the implacable mandates of Rodin, she shut the trunk and the dressing-room door, and returned into the bedroom.

After having again examined the bureau an idea crossed her mind: not content with again searching the smaller drawers, she quite drew out one, hoping to find what she sought for between the back of the drawers and the bureau, but she saw nothing. The second attempt was more successful, and she found hidden a thick copy-book. She made a motion of surprise, for she expected to find something else, but she took the manuscript and opening it, turned the leaves over with much rapidity. After having run her eye over several pages she appeared satisfied, and was about to put the copy-book in her pocket, but, after a moment's reflection, she replaced it where she had discovered it, put all again into its former state, took up her candlestick and left the apartment, without having been detected, having assured herself that La Mayeux would be with Mademoiselle de Cardoville for some hours.

* * * * *

The day after Florine's search, La Mayeux alone in her sleeping-room, was seated in an arm-chair by the chimney corner, where a good fire was blazing. A thick carpet covered the floor—through the curtains of the window were seen the bank of a large garden—the deep silence was unbroken, but by the regular noise of the pendulum of a time-piece and the crackling of the fire.

La Mayeux, with her two hands leaning on the arms of her chair, was enjoying a feeling of happiness which she had not given way to so completely since her residence in the hotel. For her, so long accustomed to cruel privations, there was an inexpressible charm in the quiet of this retreat, in the smiling appearance of the garden, and, above all, in the consciousness of owing the enjoyment she experienced, to the resignation and energy she had evinced in the midst of so many severe trials, now so happily ended.

An elderly woman, of mild and gentle appearance, who had been, by Adrienne's express orders, attached to the service of La Mayeux, entered, and said to her,— “Mademoiselle, there is a young man who wants to speak to you directly on a very urgent matter; he says his name is Agricola Baudoin.”

At this name La Mayeux uttered a slight cry of surprise, blushed slightly, and rising, ran to the door, which led to the adjoining apartment, where she found Agricola.

“Good day, my dear Mayeux,” said the smith, cordially embracing the young girl, whose cheek became burning and crimsoned with his fraternal kisses.

"Ah!" she then cried, suddenly looking at Agricola with alarm, "what is this black bandage over your forehead? Have you been wounded?"

"Oh, it is nothing—really nothing, do not think of it. I will tell you all about it presently; but, first of all, I have something very important to communicate to you!"

"Come, then, into the next room, where we shall be alone," said La Mayeux, leading Agricola.

In spite of the great uneasiness which displayed itself on Agricola's features, he could not repress a smile of pleasure as he entered the young girl's room and looked about him.

"Capital, my dear Mayeux; this is the way I always wished to see you placed, and I can recognise the kind hand of Mademoiselle de Cardoville in this. What a heart! what a soul! You do not know that she wrote to me the day before yesterday to thank me for what I had done for her, and sending me a plain gold pin, which she added I could accept, for it had no value except that of having been worn by her mother. If you know how much I was touched by the delicacy of the gift."

"Nothing should astonish you from a heart like hers," replied La Mayeux. "But your wound—your wound?"

"Directly, my good little Mayeux; I have so many things to tell you! Let me begin with that which is most important; for it is in a very serious matter that I require your good advice. You know full well what confidence I have in your excellent heart and sound judgment; and then, after that, I shall ask a service from you—yet a great service," added the smith, in a serious and almost solemn tone, which astonished La Mayeux; and he then added, "But let me begin with what does not concern myself——"

"Oh, do be quick!"

"After my mother had gone with Gabriel to a small curacy which he has procured in the country, and my father took up his abode with Maréchal Simon and his daughters, I went, as you know, to reside at the factory of M. Hardy, in the general house. Well, this morning—but I should first say that M. Hardy, after his return from a long journey which he lately made, has again gone away on business for some days. Well, then, this morning at breakfast time, I had been working a little after the last stroke of the clock, and was leaving the buildings to go to our eating-room, when I saw a lady alight from a hackney-coach, who, entering the yard, came quickly towards me. I saw she was fair, although her veil was half-way down her face, and as gentle as she was pretty: she was dressed like a person of consequence. Struck with her paleness, her uneasy and alarmed look, I inquired what she sought? 'Sir,' she said, in a trembling voice, and seeming to make a great effort over herself, 'are you one of the workmen of this establishment?' 'Yes, madam.' 'Is M. Hardy in danger?' she cried. 'M. Hardy, madam, has not yet returned to the factory.' 'What!' she exclaimed, 'did not M. Hardy return here yesterday evening? Has he not been dangerously wounded by a machine whilst in his workrooms?' And as she pronounced these words the lips of this young lady trembled so, poor thing! and I saw large tears falling down her cheeks. 'Thank Heaven, madam, nothing is more untrue,' said I; 'for M. Hardy has not yet returned, but is expected to-morrow or next day.' 'Then, sir, you tell me true, M. Hardy really has not arrived, and is not injured?' added the pretty lady, wiping her eyes. 'I tell you the truth, madam; if M. Hardy was in danger I should not be so tranquil whilst I am speaking with you.' 'Oh, thanks, thanks!' exclaimed the young lady. Then she expressed her gratitude to me with an air so rejoicing, so happy, so touching, that I was quite moved at it. Then suddenly, and as if ashamed of the step she had taken, she dropped her veil and left me hastily, going out of the yard and entering the coach which had brought her. I said to myself, She is a lady who takes an interest in M. Hardy, and who has been alarmed by some false report."

"She loves him, doubtless!" said La Mayeux, quite affected; "and, in her trouble, has perhaps committed an imprudence in coming to make these inquiries."

"No doubt you are right. I saw her get into the hackney-coach with interest, for her emotion had quite gained upon me. Well, away goes the coach. But what should I see a few instants afterwards? Why, a hack cabriolet, which the young lady did not see, concealed, as it was, by the angle of the wall; and, at the moment when it drove off, I clearly distinguished a man sitting beside the coachman, who made him a sign to follow in the same road that the hackney-coach was taking."

"The poor young lady was followed!" said La Mayeux, with uneasiness.

"No doubt. So I ran after the hackney-coach, which I overtook; and at one of the windows, when the blind was down, I said to the young lady, as I ran by the side of the coach door, 'Madame, be on your guard, you are followed by some one in a cabriolet.'"

"Good! — capital! — Agricola! And what did she say?"

"I heard her exclaim, 'Grand Dieu!' in a tone of deep alarm. The coach went on; and presently the cabriolet passed before me, and I saw by the side of the driver a tall, stout, red-faced man, who, having seen me run after the hackney-coach, had, perhaps, a suspicion of something, for he looked at me with a disturbed air."

"And when will M. Hardy arrive?" inquired La Mayeux.

"To-morrow or next day; and now, my little Mayeux, advise me. This young lady loves M. Hardy, that is evident. She is, no doubt, married, for she had a very embarrassed look as she talked with me, and uttered a cry of so much terror when she learned that she was followed. What ought I to do? I have a great mind to ask advice of old Simon; but he is so very rigid in his notions. And then, a love-affair at his time of life! Whilst you, my dear Mayeux, who are so delicate and sensible, you will comprehend the thing so well."

The young work-girl shook slightly, and smiled bitterly. Agricola, who did not perceive it, continued, —

"Then I said to myself, there is no one but La Mayeux who can advise me in this matter, and so, if M. Hardy returns to-morrow, ought I or ought I not to tell him all that has passed?"

"Listen to me!" exclaimed La Mayeux, suddenly, interrupting

Agricola, and appearing to collect her thoughts. "When I went to the Convent of Saint-Marie, to ask the superior for work, she proposed to me to enter as daily needlewoman into a house where I was to watch—it is useless to conceal the word—to spy over——"

"Wretch of a woman!"

"And do you know," said La Mayeux,—“do you know that they proposed to me to enter this family to carry on this unworthy system? It was at a Madame de Fremont's, or Bremont's—I do not quite remember which—a very religious lady, whose daughter, a young married lady, whom I was to espy particularly, as, the superior said to me, she received the too assiduous attentions of a manufacturer.”

"What do you say?" exclaimed Agricola, "if this manufacturer should be——"

"M. Hardy. I have too many reasons not to forget the name which the superior let fall. Since then so many events have transpired that I had forgotten the circumstance. It is, therefore, most probable, that this young lady is she of whom she spoke to me at the convent."

"And what interest could the superior of the convent have in this espionage?" asked the smith.

"I do not know. But, you see, the interest which she has is still in full force; for the young lady has been watched, and, perhaps, at this hour has been denounced—dishonoured. Ah, it is dreadful to think of!"

Then seeing that Agricola shuddered violently, La Mayeux added, "But what ails you, then?"

"Why not?" said the smith, speaking to himself; "if all that,—why should it not all proceed from the same hand? The superior of a convent may have a good understanding with an abbé. But, then, for what purpose, to what end?"

"Explain yourself, Agricola!" said La Mayeux. "And your wound—how did you receive that? Pray do satisfy me on that point!"

"Why, it was of my wound I was now going to speak; for, really, the more I reflect, the more the adventure of this young lady appears to me connected with other circumstances."

"What do you mean?"

"Why, you must know that, for some days past, there have been some singular transactions in the vicinity of our manufactory. In the first place, as we are in Lent, an abbé from Paris—a tall, good-looking man, they say—has been preaching in the little village of Villiers, which is but a quarter of a league from our workshops. This abbé has taken occasion in his discourse to calumniate and assail M. Hardy."

"In what way?"

"M. Hardy had drawn up and had printed a set of rules and regulations relating to our work, and the profits which he allows us. This document is followed by several maxims as noble as they are plain and simple, with some precepts of fraternity, which all the world can comprehend, extracted from different philosophers and different religions. Because M. Hardy has selected, as the most pure, from amongst different religious precepts, this abbé has taken upon himself to decide that M. Hardy has no religion of his own; and taking this conclusion for his theme, he has not only attacked him from the pulpit, but pointed out our factory as a focus of perdition, corruption, and damnation, because, on Sunday, instead of going to hear sermons or to the public-house, our workmen, their wives and children, pass the day in working in their little gardens, in reading, singing in chorus, or dancing with their families in our general house. This abbé has gone so far as to say that such a mass of atheists, for so he calls us, will draw down the wrath of Heaven on the country; that there is much talk of the cholera, which is advancing; and it will be possible that, owing to our impious vicinity, all the environs will be smitten with this avenging scourge."

"To say such things to ignorant hearers," exclaimed La Mayeux, "is to risk exciting them to terrible actions."

"That is what this abbé is driving at, unquestionably."

"What do you mean?"

"The inhabitants of the environs, excited besides, no doubt, by some other malcontents, shew themselves hostile to the workmen of our factory; and they have displayed, if not their hatred, at least their envy. Well, seeing us live in common, well lodged, well fed, well clothed, active, gay, and industrious, their jealousy is still further excited by the abbé's preachings, and the malevolent suggestions of some badly disposed fellows, whom I have recognised as some of the worst workmen at M. Tripeaud's, our rival manufacturer. All these disturbances begin to produce their fruits, and we have had two or three open quarrels with the inhabitants of the environs. It was in one of these rows that I had a blow on the head from a stone."

"Are you sure it is nothing serious, Agricola, quite sure?" asked La Mayeux, anxiously.

"Nothing of consequence, I assure you; but the enemies of M. Hardy have not confined themselves to preaching only, they have employed something even still more dangerous."

"What can that be?"

"I and almost all my comrades used our muskets pretty well in July, but it does not suit us at present, for very good reason, to take up our arms again. This is not every body's opinion very likely, we blame no one, but we have our own opinions, and the elder Simon, who is as brave as his son, and as patriotic as any man breathing, approves and directs us. Well, for some days past, we have found all round the factory, in the garden, in the yards, placards, in which we read: 'You are cowards, selfish cowards,—because chance has given you a good master, you remain indifferent to the misery of your brethren, and the means of emancipating them! Your own good fortune enervates you.'"

"Oh, Agricola! what a fearful persistence in wickedness!"

"Is it not? and these things have begun to have some influence over several of our younger comrades, as, after all, when generous and noble feelings are addressed, there is always an echo. So already some seeds of division are developed in our work-rooms, which to this time have been so fraternally united; we feel that some secret ferment exists, and a cold distrust with several has displaced our wonted cordiality. Now, if I tell you that I am almost certain that these placards, thrown over the walls of the factory, and which have excited amongst us some displays of discord, have been spread by the emissaries of this preaching abbé, don't you think that all this, combined with what occurred this morning with respect to the young lady, proves that M. Hardy has for some time past had a number of enemies?"

"The matter appears to me as alarming as it does to you, Agricola," said La Mayeux, "and to be of so serious a description, that M. Hardy alone can properly decide it. As for the affair of the lady, I advise you, directly M. Hardy returns home, to ask to see him, and however delicate may be the communication, tell him all that happened."

"There I scarcely know how to act, for will it not seem as though I sought to meddle with his private affairs?"

"Had not this lady been followed I should have partaken your scruples; but you see she was watched, and very possibly has incurred great danger. Therefore, in my opinion, it is more a matter of duty than choice to apprise M. Hardy of the whole transaction. Even supposing, as is most probable, that the lady be married, would it not be better, for a thousand reasons, that M. Hardy should be informed of every thing?"

"You are quite right, my dear Mayeux, and M. Hardy shall know all; but now that we have decided upon the affairs of others, let us have a little talk about mine. Yes, of my affairs! for I have to speak to you of a matter upon which my future happiness or misery may depend," said the smith, in a tone so serious, that poor La Mayeux's heart dreaded she knew not what. "You well know," said Agricola, after a short silence, "that from my earliest infancy, I have been in the habit of telling you every circumstance that occurred to me. I have never concealed the merest trifle from you, but have related to you my very thoughts."

"Oh, yes, Agricola!" replied La Mayeux, extending her thin and delicate hand, which the young man cordially pressed in his large sinewy grasp. "I know you have, and always will, I hope."

"Stay! I am not quite right about telling you positively every thing, because I did not like to mention many little love affairs; which, though to be sure one might tell one's sister whatever follies or scrapes one might commit or fall into, yet, somehow, I never could bring myself to mention to so good and right-minded a girl as yourself."

"Thank you, Agricola," answered La Mayeux, casting down her eyes, and struggling heroically with the dread of coming evil, which lay heavily at her heart. "I often perceived a description of reserve in many of our conversations, though I could not guess its cause, but now I feel grateful to you for having thought about my feelings."

"But at the same time that I forbore to repeat to you all the little love passages I occasionally amused myself with, I always determined, whenever any thing of that kind seemed likely to end seriously, in marriage, for instance, to let you be the very first person I should confide it to; just, you know, as a brother might intrust his sister with what he meant afterwards to submit to his father and mother, 'Then,' said I to myself, 'my dear good Mayeux shall be my first confidant.'"

"How very good of you, Agricola!"

"Well, then, something serious has happened; I am over head and ears in love; and I want to be married!"

At these fatal words the poor girl who was listening felt as though paralysed with horror; her blood seemed to curdle in her veins—an icy coldness seized her—her very sight grew dim—and for a few seconds she felt as though the hand of death was on her—her heart ceased almost to beat, and seemed not to break, but, as it were, to dissolve, to become annihilated; but the first overwhelming agony over, like the early martyrs, who found in the very excess of their sufferings a motive for enabling them to smile even amid their excruciating tortures, the unhappy girl found in her very dread of revealing the secret of her absurd and fatal passion, a power and resolution which enabled her, after a short pause, to look up with forced calm, almost amounting to serenity, and to say, in a steady voice,

"Indeed! you are really and seriously in love?"

"Oh, my dear La Mayeux, for the last four days I have thought of nothing else but my passion and of her who is the object of it."

"Then you have only been in love four days?"

"No longer, certainly; but that makes no difference, you know; the time has nothing to do with it; a great deal may happen in four days."

"And, of course, she is very beautiful?"

"Oh, lovely! just imagine a shape like a fairy of the woods, such as you and I used to read about, you remember, my dear La Mayeux; then such a skin, a lily would look dark beside her—with large blue eyes—large as that—" said Agricola, opening his own as wide as he could—"as sweet, as gentle, and as kind in their expression as—as—yours——"

"You flatter me, Agricola."

"Nonsense! you know I never should think of flattering you—no, no! I only flatter pretty girls, like Angèle—for that is the name of her I love—is it not a pretty name—tell me, my dear La Mayeux—has it not a charming sound?"

"It is, indeed," said the poor girl, comparing, with mournful bitterness, the contrast between this pleasing appellation and her own soubriquet of La Mayeux, pronounced even by the generous-hearted Agricola without a thought, but still courageously repressing any manifestations of regret, she repeated with desperate calmness, "Yes, indeed, any one might be pleased to have so pretty a name as Angèle."

"Well, then, if you like the name, what would you say to my Angèle, being both in heart, mind, and person, precisely what that name would imply. As for her heart, I really think that, for goodness, it almost equals yours."

"Then," said La Mayeux, forcing a smile, "it seems that her eyes and her heart are like mine: it is strange, being strangers, that we should resemble each other so closely."

Agricola perceived not the bitter irony which concealed the full meaning of La Mayeux's words; he, therefore, replied with a tenderness of manner as sincere as trying to his auditor,—

"Why do you suppose, my dear La Mayeux, I could ever have felt a serious affection for any one who, in their disposition, mind, or heart, did not greatly remind me of you?"

"Come, come, brother," said La Mayeux, smiling (yes, the wretched girl, while writhing in her agony, had the courage to force a smile), "you are disposed to be gallant to-day; but tell me, where did you become acquainted with this very charming person?"

"She is the sister of a fellow-workman: her mother is the head needlewoman who makes all the workmen's linen. During the last year she found that she required assistance, and, as it is one of the rules of our association always to give the preference to the relations of members, Madame Bertin (this is the name of my companion's mother) sent for her daughter from Lille, where she was living with one of her aunts; and, for the last five days, she has been in our linen establishment. The first time I ever saw her, I staid for more than three hours in the evening, talking with herself, her mother, and brother. Oh, my heart was gone before the first hour had expired. The next day, and the day after, my love kept increasing, till I am fairly over head and ears, and fully bent upon marriage. If you do not disapprove—for—don't start, my dear girl—every thing depends upon you—neither do I intend saying a word to my father or mother until I have had your opinion."

"Agricola, you really puzzle me; will you tell me what you mean?"

"You know how implicitly I believe in that singular instinct you possess. How often have you said to me, Agricola, mistrust such a one—love and esteem this person—place full confidence in another. Well, never in any one instance have I found you wrong. Now I want you to do me the same service again. You must ask permission of Mademoiselle de Cardoville to pass the day with me. I will take you to the manufactory. I have already mentioned you to Madame Bertin and her daughter as a tenderly beloved sister; and, according to the impression Angèle makes upon you will depend whether I declare my love for her or no. Perhaps you may consider this as a superstitious weakness on my part, but I cannot help it."

"So let it be," replied La Mayeux, with heroical courage; "I will see your Angèle, and then give you my sincere and unbiassed opinion."

"Of that I feel quite sure; but when will you come?"

"I must inquire of Mademoiselle de Cardoville what day she can spare me; and then I will let you know."

"Thanks, my kind La Mayeux," said Agricola, with animated fervour; then he added, smilingly, "Only remember to bring your very best judgment with you, that which you reserve for great occasions."

"No joking, brother," said La Mayeux, in a voice of mournful earnestness: "the present affair is of deep importance, and your future happiness or misery may result from it."

At this moment some one knocked gently at the door.

"Come in!" said La Mayeux.

Florine appeared.

"Mademoiselle de Cardoville begs you will go to her if you are not engaged," said Florine to La Mayeux.

The latter rose, and addressing the smith, said,—

"If you can wait a few minutes, Agricola, I will inquire of Mademoiselle de Cardoville what day I can dispose of, and I will return and tell you." So saying, the young girl quitted the room, leaving Agricola and Florine together.

"I should have been glad to have offered my humble thanks to Mademoiselle de Cardoville to-day," said Agricola; "but that I feared to be intrusive."

"My young lady is somewhat indisposed to-day," said Florine, "and sees no one; but I am sure that she will receive you with pleasure directly she is better."

La Mayeux here returned to the apartment, saying to Agricola,—

"If you will call for me to-morrow, about three o'clock—and then I shall not lose my whole day—I will accompany you to the manufactory; and in the evening you can see me safe home again."

"That will do nicely!—then fare you well—till three o'clock to-morrow, my dear La Mayeux."

"Good-by, Agricola; at three o'clock I shall expect you!"

The evening of the same day, when all was still in the hotel, La Mayeux, who had remained with Mademoiselle de Cardoville till ten o'clock, entered her bedchamber, the door of which she locked; then, finding herself at last alone, and free from all constraint, she threw herself on her knees before an arm-chair, and burst into tears. Long, long did the sorely tried girl continue to weep, when, at length, her eyes refused to shed more tears, she arose, dried her eyes, and, approaching her desk, took from it the paper book; then removed from its hiding-place the manuscript so hastily perused by Florine the preceding night, and continued for several hours to write attentively in its pages.

CHAPTER XXXI.

LA MAYEUX'S JOURNAL.

WE have already said that La Mayeux had written for a considerable portion of the night, in the book discovered and scrutinised on the previous evening by Florine, who had not dared to abstract it before she had acquainted with its contents the persons under whose directions she was acting, and having received their final instructions.

Let us explain the existence of this manuscript before we open it to the reader.

From the day on which La Mayeux had felt her love for Agricola, the first word of this manuscript had been written.

Endued with a disposition essentially loving, and yet feeling herself always restrained by fear of ridicule, a fear whose painful excess was La Mayeux's only weakness, to whom could this unfortunate girl have confided the secret of her fatal passion, but to paper—to that mute confidant of brooding or wounded hearts, that patient, silent, calm friend, which, if it do not respond to the woes of the unhappy, at least always listens to, always remembers, them?

When her heart was full of various emotions, sometimes sad and sweet, sometimes bitter and distressing, the poor sempstress, finding a melancholy charm in these mute and solitary declarations, sometimes in a poetic form, simple and touching, sometimes written in simple prose, had, by degrees, become accustomed not to place any bounds to the confidence which related to Agricola, although there was at the bottom of all her thoughts certain reflections which were produced in her by the sight of beauty, happy love, maternity, riches, and misfortune, and which were too strongly imbued with her sense of her own personal appearance, so unfortunately unprepossessing to allow of her ever communicating them to Agricola.

Such, then, was the journal of this daughter of the people, mean-looking, deformed, and wretched, but endued with an angelic soul and a bright intelligence, developed by reading, meditation, and solitude,—pages unknown, but which yet contained views clear-sighted and profound as to people and things, taken from that peculiar position in which fate had placed this unfortunate girl.

The following lines, interrupted in places, or blurred by tears, according to the course of emotions which La Mayeux had felt on the previous evening on learning the deep love of Agricola for Angèle, formed the last pages of this journal:—

“ Friday, March 3, 1832.

“ My night had not been disturbed by any painful dream, and I rose this morning without any sad presentiment.

“ I was calm, tranquil when Agricola came.

“ He did not appear to me agitated, but was, as he always is, simple and affectionate. He first told me of an event relative to M. Hardy, and then, without change or hesitation, said to me,—

“ ‘ For the last four days I have been desperately in love ; so deep has been the impression that I think of marrying, and I have come to ask your advice about it. ’

“ It was in these terms that this disclosure, so overwhelming to me, was made, naturally and cordially, as we sat by the fire, I on one side, and Agricola on the other, as if we were only discoursing of the most commonplace affairs. Yet what more was necessary to break a heart ? A person enters your room, embraces you as a brother, sits down, talks with you, and then — Oh, Heaven, I shall lose my senses !

* * * * *

“ I am calmer again. Courage, courage, poor heart ! If some day misfortune shall again crush me, I will again peruse these lines, written under the impression of the most intense grief I ever experienced, and I will say to myself, ‘ What is this present sorrow to the agony that is past ? ’

“ How cruel is this agony of mine ! It is forbidden, ridiculous, shameful. I dare not confess it even to the tenderest, the most indulgent mother.

“ Alas ! these are fearful miseries, which yet give a right to people to shrug their shoulders with pity or disdain. Alas, these are, indeed, forbidden griefs !

“ Agricola has asked me to go to-morrow to see the young girl of whom he is so passionately enamoured, and whom he will wed, if the instinct of my heart advises him to this marriage. This thought is the most agonising of all those which have afflicted me, since he so pitilessly told me of his love.

"Pitilessly!—no, Agricola—no, no, my brother—forgive this unjust cry of a suffering heart. Thou dost not know, thou couldst not suppose, that I love thee more earnestly than thou lovest, or ever canst love, this charming creature.

"The shape and figure of a nymph, fair as a lily, with blue eyes, as long as that, and almost as soft as yours."

"It was thus he drew her portrait!

"Poor Agricola, how he would have suffered, if he had but known how each word cut me to the soul!

"Never did I feel more poignantly than at this moment the deep commiseration, the tender pity, which a good and affectionate being may inspire you with, whilst, in his sincere ignorance, he wounds you to death, and smiles at you.

"Thus I blame him not; far from it, I but pity him for all the pain he would experience should he detect the grief he occasions me.

"How strange! Agricola never appeared to me handsomer than he looked to-day. How his manly face was excited when he mentioned the uneasiness of this young and handsome lady! When I heard him talk of the anguish of a woman who risks her own reputation for the man she loves, I felt my heart palpitate violently, my hands burnt like fire, a soft languor spread over my senses—absurdity!—derision!—what right have I—I—to be affected thus?

* * * * *

"I remember that, whilst he was speaking to me, I threw one look at the mirror, I was proud of being so nicely dressed, although he did not notice it; no matter, I thought my cap became me, that my hair looked nicely, and my look was soft. I thought Agricola looked so well that I fancied myself less ugly than usual! No doubt I sought thus to excuse myself in my own eyes for daring to love him.

"After all, what happened to-day must have occurred some day or other.

"Yes (and the thought is consolatory for those who love life), death itself is nothing, inasmuch as it must come, some day or other.

"What has always preserved me from suicide—that last idea of the wretch who prefers going to God to remaining amongst his fellow-creatures—has been a sentiment of duty. One should not think only of one's self.

"I said to myself also, 'God is good, always good, since the most forlorn of human beings find some one to love, some one to whom they devote themselves. How has it been that I, so weak and insignificant, have always been able to be of service and utility to some one?'

"Yet to-day I was sorely tempted to end my life. Neither Agricola nor his mother have any further need of me. Yes, but then those unfortunates of whom Mademoiselle de Cardoville has made me the helper. My benefactress herself, although she scolded me kindly for the obstinacy of my suspicions of that man, I am more than ever afraid for her, I more than ever feel that she is threatened, more than ever have I faith in the utility of my presence near her.

"I must live therefore,—live to go to-morrow and see this young girl whom Agricola loves so—so fondly!

"Merciful Heaven! Why has it ever been my lot to experience grief, but never hatred? Methinks there must be a great and bitter delight in being able to hate; it is a passion so easily roused, and so common with many; perhaps I may yet feel it, as regards the object of Agricola's affection, Angèle, as he called her, when he said, 'Is not Angèle a sweet, pretty name, La Mayeux?'

"The idea of mixing up names so dissimilar—the one expressive of all that is graceful and lovely, the other conveying but the derisive remembrance of my own wretched deformity!

"Poor, dear Agricola,—my beloved brother! who would believe that affection can sometimes inflict unconscious wounds, as deep and painful as the most premeditated cruelty?

"And wherefore should I wish to hate the fair young creature who has won Agricola's heart? Did she steal from me the beauty which has ensnared him? Alas, no! Then what cause of offence have I against her? Why cherish unkindly feelings because the hand of God has made her beautiful, and me——

"Before I had fully learned all the sad consequences of an appearance as repulsive as mine, I often asked myself, with bitter curiosity, how it came to pass that an all-wise Creator should have endowed His creatures so differently?

"A long acquaintance with sorrow has taught me to reflect calmly on many painful subjects, and the result of my meditations is, that I am perfectly persuaded that to both beauty and ugliness are attached two of the finest emotions of the soul—admiration and compassion.

"Such as myself deeply admire those who are beautiful, like Angèle and Agricola; while such as they look with pity and compassion on poor, afflicted creatures resembling me.

"How frequently it happens that, spite of our better judgment, we entertain vain and senseless hopes! Because Agricola, from motives of propriety, forbore to tell me of his love-affairs, as he now says, I had almost persuaded myself that he had never engaged in any, that his heart had never been touched, or that it was me he loved, and that the fear of ridicule prevented him, equally with myself, from confessing it. Nay, I even carried my folly so far as to write verses on the occasion; and, perhaps, inspired by the happiness the bare idea afforded me, they are the least faulty of any thing I have committed to paper.

"How strange is my position! If I love I am an object of ridicule—while the person who should requite my passion would be still more derided.

"How could I have lost sight of that certainty when I allowed myself to endure the agony which wrung my heart, and still tears it, at learning Agricola's intention; yet I bless God that, amidst all my sufferings, envy, hatred, or malice, entered not into my heart. Oh, no! nothing so base shall influence my opinion of the chosen of Agricola, to whom I will act as becomes a faithful and devoted sister, even to the very last. I will only listen to the impartial whisperings of my heart; and if I have that instinctive perception of character Agricola ascribes to me, it shall be employed to guide and enlighten him.

"My greatest dread is of bursting into tears at the sight of my innocent rival, of being unable to repress the violent struggle I am enduring.

"But, gracious Heaven! what would Agricola think? would he not read my thoughts, and obtain a full revelation of my blind, my insensate passion?

"Oh! never, never! the hour that discloses to him the fatal secret of my love shall be the last of my life; there would then exist a motive stronger than duty itself why I should cease to exist—the necessity of escaping from a hopeless, reproachful shame, which would for ever scorch and burn my brain.

"But no, this fearful evil shall not come to pass,—I will be calm. Have I not already undergone tortures in his presence, and was I not calm? Besides, no personal feelings must be allowed to overcloud the second sight, so penetrating and acute, where those I love are concerned.

"Oh! painful, painful task! For may it not happen that the very dread of being influenced by a wrong feeling in judging of Angèle may make me too indulgent in my estimate of her? and should I not, in that case, perhaps, involve the future happiness of Agricola, who leaves the sole decision in my hands?

"What a poor, weak creature I am! how easily I deceive myself! Agricola only asks my opinion because he wishes to flatter my self-pride; and also because he feels sure I could not have the painful resolution to oppose his passion. Or else, should my advice be contrary to what he desires, he will only say, 'No matter, I love Angèle, and I will take my chance of the future.'

"Still, if my advice and the instinct of my heart are powerless to guide him, wherefore should he have come hither to engage me to enter upon a mission so cruel as that of to-morrow?

"Wherefore? to afford me an opportunity of obeying his slightest wish. He has said, 'Come!' and shall I not fly to do his bidding?

"While alluding to my devotion to his request, I can but think how often have I asked the most secret recesses of my heart, whether it could be possible that he might ever have thought of loving me otherwise than as a sister, if he had for a moment reflected upon the devotedness of my affection were I his wife.

"Yet what need of such a question? Have I not ever been—and shall I not still continue—as devoted to him as though it had pleased God to have made me his wife, his sister, or mother? Why should it ever have occurred to him to think of such a thing? we have no occasion to wish for that we already possess.

"Married to Agricola?—I his wife? Merciful God! what a delusive, yet enchanting dream! what sweet—what blissful ideas of joy, too great for expression, does it not contain! But are not these delicious images of earthly happiness as ill-suited and unfitted for me to entertain, as though I sought to clothe this poor, misshapen body in all the seductive adornments only the lovely and the favoured may wear?

"I would fain know whether, when struggling beneath the accumulation of every distress, I should have suffered more than I now endure in learning the projected marriage of Agricola; would cold, hunger, and misery, have rendered me less susceptible of the agony I now feel? or would the intensity of my anguish have made me unmindful of the pangs of hunger, cold, and wretchedness?

"But this bitter and ironical strain is both sinful and unbecoming in me. And wherefore should I grieve so deeply? In what respect have the esteem, affection, or brotherly consideration of Agricola altered as far as I am concerned? I complain: but how much greater would be my sufferings if, as is often the case, I had been beautiful, loving, and devoted, and he had still preferred to me one my inferior in each of those respects? Should I not, then, be a thousand times more deserving of pity? for I both could and ought to blame him; whilst at present it is impossible for me to feel displeased at his never having thought of an union as ridiculous as impossible.

"And even had he wished it, could I, for a moment, have been selfish enough to encourage such an idea?

"Many pages in this journal have been begun like this—that is to say, under the influence of a grief too great for words to describe—and yet almost always as I committed to paper words, I would have died ere I could have uttered them, my feelings became calm, and sweet and holy resignation came to my aid, smiling with gentle patience, and pointing upwards as my future reward. And so I resign myself—hopeless, yet loving—even till my heart is cold and motionless."

* * * * *

The journal ended here—yet it was abundantly evident, by the frequent traces of tears on the paper, how bitter had been the sufferings of the writer. In truth, worn out by so many emotions, towards morning La Mayeux had replaced the journal behind the pasteboard covering from which she had taken it, not imagining it to be in greater security there than elsewhere—for who could she possibly believe in such a house capable of the smallest abuse of confidence?—but that it might be less exposed to view than if kept in one of the drawers she was in the constant habit of opening before any person.

In pursuance of her resolution, worthily to perform her duty to the end, the courageous and noble-hearted girl had awaited the coming of Agricola, and, in company with the young smith, had departed for the manufactory of M. Hardy.

Florine—aware of the absence of La Mayeux, but detained for a considerable portion of the day by her duties to Mademoiselle de Cardoville, and preferring, likewise, to wait till night ere she executed the fresh orders she had requested and received since her letter giving an account of the finding of La Mayeux's journal, with the nature of its contents—certain of not being disturbed, waited till night had set in, and then, taking a candle in her hand, proceeded to the apartment of the young sempstress.

Acquainted with the exact spot where the manuscript was deposited, she went at once to the desk, took out the pasteboard box, then drawing from her pocket a sealed letter, she prepared to substitute it for the manuscript she had taken away.

At that moment she trembled so violently as to be obliged to hold by the table for support. As has already been said, all good feeling was not extinct in the mind of Florine, she obeyed the orders given her, but she deeply felt all the ignominy and treachery of her conduct ; had it been only herself who was concerned, there is little doubt but she would have had the courage to brave every thing rather than exist under so disgraceful a subjection. But, unhappily, it was not so ; and her disgrace would have carried a mortal blow to one she loved far better than her own life ; she, therefore, resigned herself, though not without severe struggles, to play the base and infamous part allotted her.

Although nearly always ignorant of the purpose for which she acted, and still more so as to the reason of her being employed to abstract La Mayeux's journal, she vaguely foresaw that the removal of the manuscript and the substitution of the letter were fraught with the most direful consequences to the poor girl ; for she had not forgotten those ill-omened words uttered by Rodin the day preceding, "We must get rid of La Mayeux to-morrow !"

What could he have meant by those words ? and in what way could the letter he had commanded her to place in the room of the manuscript effect that purpose ?

She knew not : but of one thing she was aware, that the devotion and clear-sightedness of La Mayeux caused a well-founded uneasiness and mistrust to the enemies of Mademoiselle de Cardoville ; and even she herself, Florine, ran the risk of being one day or other discovered in her treacheries by the acute and penetrating vigilance of the young needlewoman.

This last apprehension put an end to the scruples of Florence, who putting the letter where the journal had been, replaced the paste-board case, and then concealing the manuscript under her apron, stole cautiously from the chamber of poor La Mayeux.

CHAPTER XXXII.

LA MAYEUX'S JOURNAL.

FLORINE, who had returned into her chamber some hours after she had hidden there the manuscript she had abstracted from La Mayeux's apartment, giving way to her curiosity, was resolved to look through it.

She soon felt an increasing interest, an involuntary emotion, in reading those intimate thoughts and reflections of the young work-girl.

Amongst several pieces of poetry, all of which breathed a passionate love for Agricola—a love so deep, so unalloyed, and so sincere, that Florine was touched by them, and forgot the deformity which exposed the poor Mayeux to so much ridicule. Amongst several pieces of poetry were various fragments, thoughts, or narratives, relating to various subjects. We will quote a few, in order to justify the profound impression which their reading excited in Florine's mind.

Fragments of La Mayeux's Journal.

"To-day was my birth-day. Up to this evening I had clung to a foolish hope.

"Yesterday I had gone down into Madame Baudoin's room to dress a small wound she had in her leg, when I went in Agricola was there; I am certain he was talking to his mother of me, for they were silent directly, and exchanged a very significant smile. I then observed, as I passed the chest of drawers, a very pretty card-board box, with a pincushion on the lid. I felt myself blush at the happiness I felt, for I thought this little present was intended for me, but I pretended not to see any thing. Whilst I was on my knees by his mother, Agricola went out, and I observed he took the pretty box with him. Madame Baudoin was never more kind and motherly to me than she was that evening. I thought she went to bed earlier than usual this evening. It was that I might leave her earlier, I thought, so that I might the sooner enjoy the surprise that Agricola had in store for me.

"Oh, how my heart beat as I went upstairs as quickly as I could to my room! I even remained for a moment without opening the door, in order that my happiness might last the longer.

"At length I went in, my two eyes bathed in tears of joy. I looked on my table—on my chair—on my bed—there was nothing—the little box was not there. My heart was chilled, and I said to myself, 'It will be to-morrow, for to-day is only the eve of my birth-day.'

"The day passed—the evening has come—nothing! the pretty box was not for me. There was a pincushion on the lid—it could only be for a female. To whom could Agricola have given it?

"How I am pained at this moment!

"The idea I indulged in that Agricola would thus congratulate me on my birthday was silly; I am ashamed to confess it, even to myself. But that would have proved to me that he had not forgotten that I have another name besides that of La Mayeux, by which I am always called. My susceptibility on this point is so distressing, so intense, that it is impossible for me not to experience a moment of shame and chagrin whenever I am thus called La Mayeux; and yet from my infancy I have never had any other name.

"That is the reason why I should have been so happy if Agricola had availed himself of the occasion of my birthday to call me once by my unpretending name—Madelaine.

*     *     *     *     *

"Happily he will for ever remain in ignorance of this wish and this regret."

Florine, more and more moved at the perusal of this page of such painful simplicity, turned over several leaves, and continued:—

"I have just attended the funeral of poor little Victoire Herbin, our neighbour. Her father, a carpet-maker, has been working by the month, a long way from Paris. She died at nineteen years of age, without a single relative near her. Her last moments were not painful, and the worthy woman who watched by her to the last moment said to us that she had said nothing but these words,—

“ ‘At last ! at last !’

“ And that, as with so much satisfaction, the nurse added.

“ Poor, dear girl ! she had become so wasted ! At fifteen years old she was like a rosebud—and so pretty, so fresh ! her chestnut hair as soft as silk. But by degrees she pined away. Her business, as a comber of wool mattresses, killed her. She had been, as they say, for a long time poisoned by the effluvia from the wool ; and her occupation was the more unwholesome and dangerous as she worked for poor houses, where the bedding is usually made up of refuse.*

“ She had the courage of a lion, and the resignation of an angel, and always said to me, in her small soft voice, interrupted at times by her short dry cough, ‘ I cannot last long, going on as I do, breathing vitriol-powder and lime all day long ; I vomit blood, and have sometimes such cramps in my stomach, that I faint away with it.’

“ ‘ Try another employment,’ I said to her.

“ ‘ What time have I to learn any other ?’ she replied ; ‘ and if I could, it is now too late. I am affected, that I feel ; it was not my fault,’ added the poor girl ; ‘ I did not choose my occupation—it was my father who chose it. Fortunately, he has no need of me ; and when one is dead there is no more trouble—no more fear of want of work.’

“ Victoire made this commonplace remark with great sincerity and a kind of satisfaction ; and now she is dead, saying, ‘ At last—at last.’

“ Still it is very painful to reflect that the labour to which the poor person is compelled to follow, in order to get bread, is often nothing more than a protracted suicide !

“ I said so to Agricola the other day, and he replied, that there were many other deadly occupations. The workmen employed in making aqua fortis, white lead, and minium, or red paint, amongst

* We read in the Ruche Populaire (the Public Hive), an excellent compilation, edited by a body of workmen, and of which we have already spoken :—

“ MATRASS-COMBERS.—The dust which escapes from the wool renders combing an occupation very injurious to the health, and the mischief of which is the more increased by the frauds of trade. When a sheep is killed, the neck of the wool is dyed in blood, and it must be made white again in order to sell it. For this purpose it is dipped in lime, which, after having effected the bleaching, partly remains. Then it is the workwoman who suffers, for when she is at her work the lime becomes detached in the form of dust, and is drawn into the lungs by the inspiration ; it frequently causes cramps in the stomach and vomitings, which bring on a wretched state of health. The greater part of the carders give up the employment, and those who still persist in it have, at least, a catarrh or asthma, which ends in death.

“ Then there is the hair, of which even the dearest, that which is called the sample, is not even pure. We may judge by this what must be the commonest sort which the workwomen call the vitriol hair ; which consists of the refuse of goat’s hair, deer’s hair, and the finer bristles, which are first dipped in vitriol, then into dye, to burn and disguise the foreign particles ; such as straw, thorns, and even morsels of flesh, which can scarcely be cleared away, and which are frequently met with in working this hair, and whence flies out a dust, which is as noisome as the lime which comes from the wool.”

others, are attacked by the usual and incurable complaints of which they die.

“‘Do you know,’ added Agricola,—‘do you know that they say, when they are going to their destructive factories, we are going to the slaughter-house?’

“This word was so fearfully true, that I shuddered. ‘And this occurs in our time!’ I said, with sorrow; ‘all this is publicly known. Amongst so many powerful and great persons does not one think of the mortality which thus decimates his fellows, compelled thus to eat bread that destroys them?’

“‘Why, Mayeux, my dear,’ replied Agricola, ‘whilst it is a question to enlist the people to have them slain in war, there is not much thought about them; and as to the question of organising things so as to preserve their lives, no one thinks of that but my employer, M. Hardy. And people say, ‘Bah! the hunger, misery, or suffering of the working classes, what are they? That is not a question of politics.’ ‘They are deceived,’ added Agricola,—‘IT IS MORE THAN A QUESTION OF POLITICS.’

“As Victoire did not leave enough to pay for a church-service, there was only the presenting of the body under the porch; for there is not even a simple death-mass for the poor; and then, as we could not give eighteen francs to the curé, no priest accompanied the pauper car to the common ground for burials.

“If funeral ceremonies thus shortened, unattended, cut down, are sufficient in a religious point of view, why devise any other? Is it from cupidity? If these are, on the other hand, inadequate, why make the indigent the sole victim of such inadequacy?’

“What is the utility of troubling ourselves with the pomps, the incense, and the singing, of which persons appear to be more or less prodigal or sparing? What’s their use?—what’s their use? They are but vain and terrestrial things, and of these the soul has no further desire, when, glorious, it returns to the hands of Him who gave it.

* * * * *

“Yesterday Agricola made me read an article in a newspaper, in which, by turns, great blame and bitter and disdainful irony were employed to assail, what was called, the pernicious tendency of certain of the people to instruct themselves, to write, read poetry, and sometimes compose verses.

“Rational enjoyments are interdicted to us by our poverty. Is it humane to reproach us with endeavouring to acquire the enjoyments of the mind?

“What ill can result, if, every evening, after a hard day’s labour, cut off from every other pleasure or amusement, I please myself, unknown to others, in putting certain verses together, or in writing in this journal the impressions, good or bad, which I have felt?

“Is Agricola a worse workman because, when he returns home to his mother, he employs his Sunday in composing one of those popular songs which elevate the labours of the artisan, and which say to all, Hope and Brotherhood? Is not this a more proper use of his time than if he passed it in the public-house?

“Ah! those who blame us for these innocent and noble diversions from our painful toils and ills, are deceived when they suppose, that in proportion as the intelligence spreads and refines itself, we support more impatiently our privations and misery, and that our irritation is the more increased against the happy of this world.

"Even admitting that it were so, although it is not so, would it not be better to have an informed and enlightened opponent, whose reason and feeling could be appealed to, than an ignorant, brutal, and implacable enemy?"

"But no, on the contrary, hatreds are effaced in proportion as the mind is developed—as the horizon of fellow-feeling is widened. We can thus comprehend moral griefs; and then we see that the rich too frequently have deep sufferings, and that the similarity of misfortune creates a common bond of sympathy.

"Alas! they too lose, and bitterly bewail, idolised children, beloved wives, adored parents,—they too, especially the females, in the midst of luxury and splendour, often have broken hearts, suffering spirits, and many bitter tears shed in secret.

"Let them have no fears on this point.

"By becoming informed and their equals in understanding, the people learn to pity the rich if they are unfortunate and good, and to pity them still more if they are fortunate and wicked.

* * * * *

"What happiness!—what a day of delight! I hardly know how to contain my joy. Oh, yes! man is good, humane, charitable!—oh, yes! the Creator has implanted in him all generous instincts, and, unless he be a monstrous exception, he never does ill voluntarily.

"I saw what follows just now—I do not wait until evening to write it, for delay (if I may say so) would chill my heart.

"I was going along with some work required in great haste, and, passing along the Place du Temple, a few steps before me I saw a child not more than twelve years of age, with bare head and feet, in spite of the cold, clad only in a pair of trousers and a smock-frock all in rags, leading by the bridle a large fat cart-horse, not drawing, but still having his harness on. From time to time, the horse stopped and refused to stir, and the child, not having a whip to make him go on, in vain tugged at the rein; the horse remained stock still. Then the poor little fellow exclaimed, 'Oh, dear! oh, dear!' and cried bitterly, whilst he looked around him to ask assistance from some of the passers-by.

"His dear little face expressed such great affliction, that, without reflecting, I attempted a thing which I cannot now think of without smiling, for I must have appeared very odd indeed.

"I have a horrible fear of horses, and still greater dread of making myself conspicuous, but I did not think of either, but armed myself with courage. I had an umbrella in my hand, and, going up to the horse, with the energy of an ant which seeks to shake a large stone with a morsel of straw, I gave him, with all my might, a blow with my umbrella on his hind quarters.

"'Ah, thank you, my good lady!' cried the child, drying his tears; 'give him another blow, if you please, and perhaps he will go on!'

"I redoubled my blow with great heroism, but the horse, either from ill-temper or idleness, bent his knees, laid down, and rolled on the stones; and in so doing, finding himself encumbered with his harness, he broke it, and completely smashed his large wooden collar. I had moved away as quickly as I could, for fear of being kicked. The child, at the sight of this fresh disaster, threw himself on his knees in the middle of the street, and, clasping his hands, he sobbed out in a voice of agony, 'Help! help!'

"The cry was heard, several of the passers-by came round, and a beating much more effectual than mine was administered to the restive brute, who got up,—but in such a condition, without his harness!

" 'My master will beat me,' cried the poor child, with renewed sobs; 'I am two hours behind my time, for the horse would not move on, and now only see his broken harness! My master will beat me and turn me away, and then what will become of me, for I have no father or mother?'

"At these words, uttered with a voice of despair, a worthy shopkeeper of the Temple, who was looking on, said, with a sympathising voice,—

" 'No father nor mother! Come, don't be down-hearted, my poor boy; there are ways and means in the Temple, and we can mend your harness, and, if my gossips are of my mind, you shan't go any more with bare head and feet in such weather as this.'

"Her speech was hailed with acclamation, and they led the child and horse away, and, whilst some were engaged in repairing the harness, one shopkeeper gave him a cap, another a pair of stockings, another a pair of shoes, another a good waistcoat, and in a quarter of an hour, the boy was warmly clad, the harness repaired, and a tall lad of eighteen with a whip, which he smacked about the ears of the horse as a sort of warning, said to the child, who was looking at his clothes and the shopkeepers as if he thought himself the hero of a fairy tale,—

" 'Where does your master live, my boy?'

" 'Quay of the Canal Saint-Martin, sir,' was the reply, in a voice broken and trembling with emotion.

" 'Well, then,' added the young man, 'I will assist you in leading your horse, who will go well enough with me, and I will tell your master that the delay is not your fault. They ought not to trust a restive horse with a child so young as you.'

"As they were going, away the poor little fellow said in a timid voice to the shopkeeper, taking off his hat,—

" 'Madam, will you let me kiss you?'

"And tears of gratitude filled his eyes. The boy had a good heart.

"This scene of public charity moved me most delightfully, and I followed with my eyes, as long as I could, the young man and the child, who could now scarcely keep up with the horse, who had so speedily become obedient from fear of the whip. Well, I repeat it with pride, the creature is naturally good, and full of pity; nothing could be more spontaneous than this movement of pity and tenderness in this assembly of persons, when the poor boy exclaimed, 'What will become of me, I have neither father nor mother?'

"Unhappy child! Yes, no father nor mother, said I to myself, belonging to a brutish master, who scarcely clothes him with miserable rage, and maltreats him—lying down, no doubt, in some corner of a stable. Poor child! he is still gentle and good in spite of misery and misfortune. I saw very plainly that he was more grateful than rejoiced at the kindness done to him; but perhaps this good disposition, abandoned, without support, without advice, without aid, rendered rough by ill-treatment, will change and become fierce, exasperated; then will come the age of passions—then bad excitements!

“Ah, with the neglected outcast poor, virtue is doubly holy and to be respected!

* * * * *

“This morning after having, as usual, gently scolded me for not going to mass, Agricola’s mother said to me, and it was so touching from the mouth of her so devoutly a believer,—

“‘Fortunately, I pray more for you than myself, my poor dear Mayeux; the good God will hear me, and you will, I hope, only go into purgatory.’

“Good soul! worthy creature! She said these words with so much kindness, so full of earnestness, with a belief so fervent in the happy result of her pious intervention, that I felt my eyes grow moist, and I threw myself round her neck as sincerely and seriously grateful as if I believed in purgatory.

“This has been a fortunate day for me; I think I shall find work; and I owe this good fortune to a young woman full of kind feeling and good heart. She is to take me to-morrow to the Convent of Saint-Marie, where she thinks she can find employment for me.”

Florine, already deeply affected by the perusal of this journal, started at this passage in which La Mayeux spoke of her, and continued:—

“I shall never forget the deep interest, the delicate benevolence, with which this young person received me,—me so poor and wretched. That does not astonish me at all, for she was in Mademoiselle de Cardoville’s service. She is worthy to be about the person of Agricola’s benefactress. It will be always pleasant and delightful to me to recall her name, which is as pretty and becoming as her countenance,—it is Florine. I am nothing, I possess nothing; but, if the fervent wishes of a heart deeply impressed with gratitude be heard, Mademoiselle Florine will be happy, very happy.

“Alas! I am reduced to offer up nothing but wishes for her—nothing else have I—and I can do nothing but recollect and love her.”

These lines, which so simply spake the real gratitude of La Mayeux gave the last blow to Florine’s hesitation. She could not any longer resist the generous temptation which assailed her.

As she had continued the perusal of the various fragments of the journal, her affection and her respect for La Mayeux had increased, and she felt more acutely than ever how infamous it was to surrender, perhaps to sarcasm and bitter disdain, the most secret thoughts of the poor girl. Fortunately good is often as contagious as evil. Purified by all she had read, having strengthened her failing virtue in this vivifying and pure source, Florine, yielding at last to one of those good impulses which sometimes controlled her, left her apartment, taking the manuscript with her, and quite resolved, if La Mayeux had not returned, to return it to the place whence she had taken it, making up her mind to tell Rodin that the second time her search after the journal had been useless, La Mayeux having doubtless detected the first attempt to abstract it.

LA MAYEUX'S APARTMENT.

CHAPTER XXXIII.

THE DISCOVERY.

IN the interval which had preceded Florine's resolution to repair her unworthy abuse of confidence, La Mayeux, after a faithful discharge of her painful duty, had returned from visiting the manufactory. Equally struck with Agricola, by the innocent beauty, engaging simplicity, good sense, and sweetness of character, exhibited by Angèle, La Mayeux, after a most close and careful scrutiny, had, with magnanimous sincerity, advised the young smith to lose no time in seeking to obtain her affections. The following scene was enacted ere Florine, having finished perusing the manuscript so surreptitiously obtained, had brought herself to the praiseworthy intentions of returning it.

It was ten o'clock in the evening, and La Mayeux, just returned to the Hôtel de Cardoville, had gone into her chamber, and, exhausted by the severe mental conflict she had undergone for so many hours, thrown herself into an arm-chair. The utmost silence reigned throughout the house, only interrupted by the violence of the wind, as it swayed and shook the trees in the garden. A single light burned in the chamber, the hangings of which were of dark green, whose sombre tints, added to the black dress she wore, served still more to display the more than ordinary paleness of La Mayeux.

Seated beside the fire, her head drooping on her breast, her hands clasped on her knees, the mild, yet melancholy and resigned, countenance of the poor sempstress bore that look of unutterable sweetness, arising from the consciousness of duties well performed.

Like all those whom a long acquaintance with misfortune has accustomed to bear their griefs without exaggeration or display, in fact to receive sorrow as too habitual a visitor to require any parade, La Mayeux was incapable of long indulging in vain and fruitless regrets for what was now irrevocably decided. The blow had been fearfully sudden and painful, and would doubtless long rankle in the heart of the unhappy being on whom it had so unexpectedly descended; but there was equal probability of its becoming one of those chronic sorrows, which formed the part and parcel of her ill-starred existence. And still the noble-minded being, thus writhing in her agony, yet scarcely accusing her severe destiny, found sources of consolation even amidst her present distress; her tender, affectionate nature had been sensitively alive to the demonstrations of regard bestowed on her by her happy rival, Angèle; and her heart swelled with the proudest satisfaction at witnessing the blind confidence with which Agricola awaited her decision respecting his mistress, and the unbounded joy with which he listened to her prognostics of the future happiness that would result from the marriage he so ardently desired.

"And besides," argued La Mayeux, mentally, "at least I shall no more be disturbed (even in spite of my better judgment) by false hopes only, but by suppositions as absurd as unfounded: the marriage of Agricola will put an end to all the wild fancies of my poor brain."

And, last of all, La Mayeux experienced the greatest possible delight in having passed thus firmly and well over the severe trial she had just undergone, as well as for the effectual concealment of her love for Agricola; for the reader has already been told, how surpassingly great was the shuddering horror felt by the poor girl at the idea of the ridicule she felt perfectly convinced must follow the discovery of her insensate passion.

After remaining long absorbed in her deep reverie, La Mayeux arose and walked slowly towards her desk.

"My only recompense for all I have endured," said she, as she prepared her writing materials, "will be to confide this last new and terrible grief to the sad and silent witness of all my sorrows. I shall, at least, have kept the engagement entered into with myself; for believing, from the bottom of my heart, that the object selected by Agricola is calculated to secure his happiness, I have delivered to him my conscientious advice to marry; so when, perhaps in years to come, I shall read over what I have here written, I may possibly find a compensation for my present sufferings."

So saying, La Mayeux drew out the pasteboard box; a cry of astonishment escaped her at the absence of her journal, but this was quickly turned to fear when she perceived in its place a letter addressed to herself.

The features of the poor girl became of the livid hue of death; her knees trembled, and a faintness like that of death stole over her; but gaining power and energy, even from the excess of her terror, she exerted herself sufficiently to break the seal of the mysterious epistle.

As she did so, a note for five hundred francs (20*l.*) fell from the paper on the table, while the eager eye of La Mayeux read the following lines,—

"MADemoiselle,

"The account given by you in your journal of your love for Agricola is at once so amusing as well as original that I cannot deny myself the pleasure of acquainting him with the violent passion he has excited, a fact of which he is far from dreaming; but once known to him, he will of course hasten to return. Advantage will be taken of the present opportunity to admit a number of persons to share in the amusement derivable from the perusal of your love-stricken journal, and of which they would otherwise have been deprived. Should written copies and extracts be insufficient to gratify general curiosity, printed specimens will be distributed among all who desire them. It would, indeed, be the height of selfishness to keep so fine a treat of the sublime and beautiful to ourselves. Your readers will doubtless be differently affected by your love-lorn effusions; some they will move to laughter, others perhaps to tears; for what may strike some class of persons as touchingly pathetic, will cause inextinguishable laughter and merriment in others,—‘many men, many minds.’ But one thing is quite certain, your journal will be the town talk for a time at least, to that I pledge myself. As a person of your very singular ideas may prefer getting out of the way of your triumph, and as you possessed nothing but the rags upon your back when you were admitted, out of charity, into the house, where now you seek to rule and govern, giving yourself all manner of insolent and unbecoming airs, ill-suited to one of your appearance as well as pretensions, you are presented with the sum of five hundred francs to pay for the paper used in your love-sick journal, and in order that you may not be quite destitute in the event of your being sufficiently modest to dread the many congratulations with which, by to-morrow, you will be overwhelmed; for of this you may be quite sure, that at the very moment of your reading this, your journal will be in rapid circulation.

“One like yourself,
“A real MAYEUX.”

The coarse and insolent tone of mockery displayed in this letter, which was designedly written as though coming from some servant of the house, jealous of the introduction of La Mayeux into the establishment, had been calculated with fiendish skilfulness as sure to produce all the effect desired.

“Gracious God!” were the only words that fell from the ashy lips of the wretched girl during her first stupor and affright.

If the reader will recall the passionate tenderness with which the unfortunate Mayeux had revealed her love for her adopted brother; the many passages in her journal in which she speaks of the numerous wounds Agricola had unconsciously inflicted on her; and, lastly, her intense horror and dread of ridicule, he may be able to form some idea of her overwhelming shame and utter despair after the perusal of this infamous epistle.

The heart-broken girl thought not for an instant of the noble sentiments, the touching incidents, also recorded in the same journal; the one idea which filled her half-distracted brain was, that the following day, not only Agricola himself, and Mademoiselle de Cardoville, but an insolent and mocking crowd of others, would also be aware of her ridiculous passion, and would pitilessly laugh her to scorn.

So stunning, so unexpected was this blow, that for a time La Mayeux staggered under its violence, and, for several minutes, she remained mute, passive, and crushed in mind and body; but at length the bitter conviction rose to her mind that a fearful necessity required immediate exertion—she must lose no time in quitting for ever the hospitable roof which had received and sheltered her after so many misfortunes. The extreme timidity, the sensitive delicacy of the poor girl, would not permit her to remain an instant longer in a dwelling where the innermost secrets of her heart had thus been surprised, profaned, and, doubtless, given up to scorn and derision.

She dreamed not of seeking justice or vengeance at the hands of Mademoiselle de Cardoville; to excite anger and create disturbance in the house, at the very moment she was quitting it, would have been considered by her as ungrateful and disrespectful towards her benefactress. To her it mattered not what motive could have led to the abstraction of her journal, or who had penned the insulting letter left in its place. Alas! what could a knowledge of either circumstance have availed her, fully determined as she was to fly from the humiliations with which she was threatened?

As had been hoped for, a vague notion took possession of her mind, that her misery was brought about by some menial jealous of the kindness and consideration bestowed on her by Mademoiselle de Cardoville. Thus, then, the poor girl thought, with despairing agony, that those pages, so painfully confidential, describing feelings she would not have dared breathe in the ear of the most tender and indulgent mother, because written in a manner with the blood of her deepest wounds, they too faithfully portrayed—too cruelly described, the writhings of her stricken heart,—yet these very transcripts of her secret sorrows would serve to amuse—nay, perhaps were even now exciting the jeers and vulgar jests of the servants of the Hôtel.

*	*	*	*	*	*
*	*	*	*	*	*
*	*	*	*	*	*

The money accompanying this letter, and the insulting manner in which it was offered, served still further to confirm her suspicions as to the source of her present affliction. No doubt the sender feared that a dread of poverty might prevent her from quitting the house. The determination of La Mayeux was taken with that calm and decided resignation so habitual with her. She rose, her eyes sparkling with unnatural brilliancy, while not a tear moistened her pale and haggard cheeks. Alas! the unfortunate girl had shed so many within the last twenty-four hours that the source seemed dried up. With a cold and trembling hand, she hastily wrote the following lines on a slip a paper, which she left beside the bank-note for five hundred francs:—

"May Mademoiselle de Cardoville be recompensed as she deserves for her great goodness to me, and may she add to that kindness by pardoning my abrupt departure from a house I can remain in no longer."

This done, La Mayeux cast into the fire the infamous letter, which seemed to scorch her hands as it passed through them. Then casting a last glance at her chamber, furnished almost luxuriously, she shuddered with involuntary dread as she thought of the misery which awaited her—of the distress, exceeding all she had ever experienced, even amidst her many trials; for the mother of Agricola had departed with Gabriel. The unfortunate girl could no longer depend upon the almost maternal tenderness and sympathy of the wife of Dagobert.

A lonely, solitary life, embittered by the undying agony of believing that her fatal love was the jest, the derision of all, perhaps of Agricola himself, was all the prospect the future offered to the poor trembling creature, who now prepared to wander forth she knew not whither. But from such a vista of endless wretchedness her very soul recoiled. Then a dark thought suggested itself to her mind; a tremor passed over her, while a smile of bitter exultation played over her pallid features.

Fully resolved to depart without delay, she proceeded towards the door, but, in passing the fire-place, she saw herself reflected in the glass placed over the chimney — her death-like countenance contrasting strongly with the black dress she wore. Then, for the first time, she remembered that she had no claim to the clothes she wore; and again she remembered the passage in the letter, reminding her of the ragged garments she wore when she first entered that house.

"It is well I thought of it," cried she, in tones of anguish and a smile of bitterness, as she looked at her black dress, "I might have been accused of stealing."

So saying, the young girl, carrying her candle with her, entered her dressing-room, and resumed the miserable garments she had carefully preserved as a sort of pious remembrance of her past misfortunes.

At this moment the tears of La Mayeux broke forth afresh, and she wept long and abundantly. They flowed not at seeing herself thus again clad in the livery of poverty and misery, but from the plenitude of her gratitude; for all these comforts to which she now bade an eternal adieu recalled vividly to her mind the considerate kindness and delicate attention of Mademoiselle de Cardoville, and yielding to an almost involuntary burst of feeling, she threw herself (as soon as dressed in her former wretched attire) on her knees, in the midst of her chamber, and, mentally apostrophising,—

"Mademoiselle de Cardoville!" she exclaimed, in a voice broken by convulsive sobs, "farewell for ever!—farewell, kind, generous lady, who deigned to honour me with favours above my utmost endeavours to deserve, and who honoured me even by the appellation of friend!—sister!"

In sudden terror the poor Mayeux rose from her kneeling attitude; she heard some one stealthily approaching by the passage which led from the garden to one of the doors of her apartment, the other door opening upon the salon.

The steps were those of Florine, who (unfortunately too late) was returning with the manuscripts. Alarmed and driven to desperation by the sound of footsteps, which, she believed, came but to proclaim her the scorn and ridicule of the house, La Mayeux rushed from the salon, and, quickly flying through the ante-room, reached the court-yard, tapped with frenzied eagerness against the windows of the porter's lodge, and, as soon as the gate was opened, darted into the street.

The door closed after her, and La Mayeux ceased to be within the cherished precincts of the Hôtel de Cardoville.

* * * * *

Thus was Adrienne deprived of a faithful, vigilant, and devoted guardian, while Rodin was likewise freed from an active, penetrating antagonist, whom he had always, and with just cause, dreaded.

Having (as has been seen) divined the love entertained by the poor sempstress for Agricola; knowing also of her skill in poesy, and arguing therefrom that she would thus in secret pour forth her fatal and concealed passion, he had instructed Florine to search diligently for some written testimonies of this ill-starred affection. From the success attending this manœuvre arose the coarse and galling epistle, calculating to goad on a mind so sensitively alive as La Mayeux's to the most desperate measures. Of the contents of this epistle, it is but justice to Florine to say, she was entirely ignorant, having merely received it in reply to her account of the contents of the journal, which she had, in the first instance, merely glanced over without allowing herself to remove it.

* * * * *

As we have already said, Florine, influenced by a too tardy repentance, only reached the chamber of La Mayeux at the moment when the latter was flying in wild despair from the Hôtel.

Perceiving a light in the dressing-closet, Florine hastened thither. On a chair was thrown the black dress just taken off by La Mayeux, while, at a little distance, stood the old trunk in which the poor girl had hitherto religiously preserved her wretched attire of former days; the box was now open and empty.

Heart-stricken by this sight, Florine proceeded to the desk. The disorder in which the various articles were left, the bank-note of five hundred francs, beside which lay the few lines addressed to Mademoiselle de Cardoville, proved but too clearly the fatal consequences of her obedience to the orders of Rodin, and that the unhappy victim of his persecutions had quitted the house for ever.

Perceiving the utter uselessness of any further attempt, and acknowledging with a sigh, that her repentance had come too late to save the unfortunate girl, Florine resigned herself to the necessity of forwarding the manuscript to Rodin. Then, obliged to console herself for the evil she had wrought by fresh arguments of evil, she remembered that the absence of La Mayeux would diminish the chances of discovering her treachery, and render her disgraceful task less hazardous and dangerous.

* * * * *

The day following these events Adrienne received the following note from Rodin, in reply to one which she had written relative to the inexplicable departure of La Mayeux:—

“MY DEAR YOUNG LADY,

“Being obliged to proceed directly to the manufactory of the worthy M. Hardy, whither I am summoned on a most important affair, I am utterly unable to wait upon you and offer my most humble respects. You ask me, ‘What am I to think of the sudden disappearance of the young girl I lately took into my house?’ In truth, the question is beyond my power to answer; let us hope that future events may explain it to her credit, nay, I feel persuaded it will be so. Only remember what I said to you at Dr. Baleinier’s, touching a certain society, and the numerous and secret emissaries it employs to surround perfidiously the persons whom it is requisite to put under a system of espionage.

“I accuse no one, but let us simply recall facts. I have been accused and stigmatised by this very girl, yet your own knowledge and experience assure you, you have not a more faithful or devoted servant than myself.

“She was utterly penniless when you received her, yet in her desk is found the sum of five hundred francs ! You have loaded her with benefits, yet she quits your roof without a word, or the smallest endeavour to explain the cause of her unjustifiable flight.

“Still, my dear young lady, I draw no conclusions ; I abhor the very idea of condemning unheard. But reflect seriously, and, above all, be well upon your guard,—you have possibly escaped some great danger. To redouble your circumspection, and increase your watchful mistrust of all around you, is the respectful advice of your very humble and most obedient servant,

“RODIN.”

PART VIII.

THE FACTORY.

---

CHAPTER XXXIV.

THE GATHERING OF THE "LOUPS."

It was Sunday morning. It was on the same day that Made-moiselle de Cardoville had received Rodin's letter relative to the disappearance of La Mayeux.

Two men were conversing at a table in one of the public-houses in the small village of Villiers, situated at a short distance from M. Hardy's factory.

This village was generally inhabited by workmen at the quarries and stone-cutters employed in working the neighbouring stone-pits. Nothing can be more severe, more exhausting, and worse paid, than the labours of these artisans; and thus, as Agricola had told La Mayeux, they established a painful comparison between their lot, miserable as it was, and the almost incredible ease and comfort which the workmen of M. Hardy, thanks to his generous and sagacious management, as well as the principles of association and companionship which he had established amongst them.

Misfortune and ignorance always originate great evils. Misfortune is easily soured, and ignorance but too often gives way to noxious counsels; and for a long time the good fortune of the workmen of M. Hardy had been naturally envied, but not as yet affected by jealousy or hatred. Soon, however, the secret enemies of this manufacturer, set on by M. Tripeaud, his rival, had their own objects in altering this peaceable state of things, and they were changed.

With diabolical pertinacity, and similar address, they contrived to excite the worst passions. They commenced, by chosen emissaries, by getting hold of certain quarriers and stone-cutters of the neighbourhood, whose irregular lives had aggravated their miseries. Notoriously known by their turbulence, bold and active, these men exercised a dangerous influence over their peaceable, hard-working, well-disposed companions, but who were easily intimidated by violence. These dangerous ringleaders, already soured by misfortune, had their jealous hatred excited and fomented by pointing out to them the comfort and consideration enjoyed by M. Hardy's workmen. They went farther. The inflammatory preachings of an abbé, a member of the Order, who, coming from Paris expressly to preach during Lent against M. Hardy, had had immense influence over these workmen's wives; who, whilst their husbands were at the public-house, hastened to hear the sermon. Taking advantage of the growing alarms of the approach of the cholera, their weak and credulous imaginations were struck with terror when pointing to the factory of M. Hardy as a focus of corruption and damnation, capable of drawing down the vengeance of Heaven, and, consequently, this avenging scourge on the district. The men, already bitterly envious, were, moreover, constantly worked upon by their wives; who, excited by the abbé's preaching, raved and uttered maledictions against this stronghold of atheists, who would be sure to draw down such miseries on their country.

Some evil-disposed individuals belonging to the workshops of Baron Tripeaud, and bribed by him (we have before alluded to the interest which this honourable person had in M. Hardy's ruin), had increased the general irritation, and wrought it to a pitch by ripping up one of these terrible questions of companionship, which in our days still unhappily cause bloodshed from time to time.

A great number of M. Hardy's workmen, before entering into his employ, had become members of a companionship, or fraternity, called the Dévorans;* whilst many of the stone-cutters and quarriers of the vicinity belonged to a society called the Loups (wolves), and from time immemorial, rivalry the most inveterate had existed between the Loups and the Dévorans, and led to many bloody strifes, the more to be deplored as, in many points of view, the institution of companionships is excellent, inasmuch as it is founded on the fruitful and powerful principle of association. Unfortunately, instead of including all bodies of the state in one fraternal communion, companionship has been broken up into fractions of collective and distinct societies, whose rivalries often break out into fierce and sanguinary collisions.†

* Devourers is the English translation; but does not express fully the combination as it existed, and exists still, in Paris; much like the fellowship of tailors called "Flints," which existed in England (perhaps still exists), and who, in or about the year 1814-15, "turned out," or "struck," on the factories of Mr. Maberly, the eminent contractor of Paul's Wharf, London, and of whom the ringleaders were tried for conspiracy and punished. All the journeymen tailors who would not join the "Flints" were by them styled "Dungs," and they refused to work at the same boards with them.—Eng. Trans.

† We should say, to the praise of the working classes, that these sad scenes become the more rare in proportion as they become better informed, and have more consciousness of their own dignity. We should, also, attribute these better tendencies to the right influence of an excellent work on companionship, published by M. Agricola Perdiguier, called Avignonnais-la-Vertu, a Working Carpenter. In this work, filled with information and curious details as to various societies of companionship, M. Agricola Perdiguier protests, with the indignation of an honest man, against the scenes of violence capable of injuring all that is useful and practicable in companionship; and this work, written with remarkable clearness, reason, and moderation, is not only an excellent work, but a noble and praiseworthy act; for M. Agricola Perdiguier has had for a long time to contend strongly, in order to bring back his associates to sensible and peaceable notions. Let us add, that M. Perdiguier has instituted, by the aid of no resources but his own, in the Faubourg Saint-Antoine, an unpretending establishment of the greatest utility to the working classes. He lodges in his house, a model of order and good conduct, about forty or fifty working carpenters, to whom, every evening after the day's work, he gives a course of lectures on geometry and linear architecture applied to the cutting of wood. We have been present at one of these courses, and it is impossible that lectures should be more clearly delivered, or made more easy to the understanding. At ten o'clock in the evening, after the conclusion of the lecture, all the lodgers of M. Perdiguier

For eight days the Loups, highly excited at all points, longed most eagerly to find an opportunity and excuse to come to loggerheads with the Dévorans; but, as these latter did not frequent the public-houses, and seldom quitted the factory during the week, this had hitherto been impracticable, and the Loups were compelled to await the Sunday with fierce impatience.

Moreover, a great number of quarriers and stone-cutters, peaceable men and good workmen, had refused, although Loups themselves, to join in this hostile manifestation against the Dévorans of M. Hardy's factory; and the ringleaders had been obliged to raise recruits amongst the vagabonds and scamps of the barriers, whom the prospect of tumult and disorder had easily induced to enrol themselves under the flag of the warlike Loups.

Such was the muttering fermentation which agitated the little village of Villiers, whilst the two men to whom we have alluded were seated at table in the public-house.

These men had asked for and obtained a private room.

One of them was still young, and tolerably well clad, but his open waistcoat, his loosely tied cravat, his shirt stained with wine, his hair dishevelled, his haggard countenance, his swollen veins, and red eyes, betokened that a night of dissipation had preceded this morning, whilst his heavy and coarse look, his hoarse voice, and his glance, now dull and now sparkling, testified that to the stale fumes of drunkenness of the previous night were now united the first approaches of a renewed inebriety.

The companion of this man said to him, jingling their glasses together,—

"Your health, my boy!"

"Yours!" replied the young fellow; "although your appearance has a devilish odd effect on me."

"Devilish odd effect?"

"Yes."

"And why, pray?"

"How did you know me?"

"Are you sorry I ever knew you?"

"Who told you I was confined in Sainte-Pélagie?"

"Did I release you from gaol?"

"Why did you do so?"

"Because my heart is good."

"You love me, perhaps;—much about as the butcher loves the ox he drives to the slaughter-house."

"You are insane."

"A man does not pay 10,000 francs (400*l.*) for another without some motive."

go to their humble beds (they are forced by the low price of wages to sleep usually four in each small room). M. Perdiguier told us that study and instruction are such powerful modes of moralising, that in six years he had sent away but one of his lodgers. "At the end of two or three days," he said to us, "the ill-disposed feel that this is no place for them, and leave of their own accord." We are happy to be able, then, to render our public testimony to a man filled with information, right feeling, and the most noble devotion to the working classes.—EUGENE SUE.

"I have a motive."

"What is it? what do you want with me?"

"A jolly companion, who spends his money freely and without thought or care, and passes all his nights as you did the last. Good wine, good cheer, pretty girls, and merry staves! It is not a bad trade, is it?"

After remaining silent for a moment, the young man replied, with a sullen air,—

"Why, the evening before I left the prison, did you make it one of the conditions of my freedom that I should write to my mistress that I would never see her again? Why did you insist that I should give you this letter?"

"What a sigh! Do you think still of her?"

"Perpetually."

"You are wrong. Your mistress is far from Paris at this moment; I saw her go away in a diligence before I returned to release you from Sainte-Pélagie."

"Yes, I was choking in that gaol, and to get out I would have sold my soul to the evil one; you thought as much, and therefore came to me, only, instead of my soul, you took Céphyse away from me,—poor Queen-Bacchanal! But why—mille tonnerres!—will you tell me why?"

"A man who has a mistress whom he is so infatuated with as you with this girl, ceases to be a man, and, in a time of trial, would want pluck."

"What time of trial?"

"Drink, man,—let us drink!"

"You make me drink too much brandy."

"Pooh! Look—see me."

"You really frighten me; it seems so devilish. A bottle of brandy does not make you wink an eyelid. You have a cast-iron inside, and a skull of marble."

"I have travelled a good deal in Russia, and there one drinks to warm oneself."

"And here to excite oneself; but let us drink if you will, only it must be wine."

"Absurd stuff! Wine is good for children; men, like us, drink brandy."

"Well, then, let's have brandy; it burns me, and one's head whirls, and then one sees all the flames of hell!"

"Come, I like you now."

"When you said just this minute that I was infatuated about Céphyse, and that in a time of trial I should want pluck, what time did you allude to?"

"Drink, man,—drink."

"One moment, if you please. You see, comrade, that I am not a bigger fool than my neighbour, and, by the few words you have let drop, I guess there's something in the wind."

"Do you?"

"You know I have been a workman, and am acquainted with a great many others, that I am a good sort of fellow enough, and popular with my comrades, and you wish to make use of me as a sort of lure to attract others."

"Go on."

"You are some one employed to get up a riot—some emissary of a party desirous of a revolt."

"Continue."

"And you are acting for this nameless association, which carries on its business by discharges of musketry."

"Are you a coward?"

"I? Why, I burnt powder in July, and as boldly as any one."

"Are you inclined to do so again?"

"Ah! why this sort of fireworks is as good as another; but, in my opinion, revolutions are more for the agreeable than the useful. All I got out of the Barricades of the Three Days was to burn my trousers and lose my waistcoat. This is all that the people gained in my person. It's all very fine and grand to hear 'Forward! to the charge!'—but what good has come of it?"

"You know a good many of M. Hardy's workmen?"

"Oh, oh! that's the reason you have brought me here."

"It is; and you will see directly several of the workmen from his factory."

"Some of the lads from M. Hardy's wishing for a row? They are too well off for that—you mistake."

"You will see that very shortly."

"They who are so comfortable, what have they to complain off?"

"What, when their comrades, and those who not having a good master, are dying of hunger and misery, and they are appealed to to join them? Do you believe they will remain deaf to that appeal? M. Hardy is the exception; but let the people give 'one long pull—strong pull—and pull altogether,' and the exception becomes the rule, and every one is content."

"There is reason in what you say; only it is requisite that the 'long pull' must, indeed, be 'a strong pull,' if it ever makes a good and honest man of my hound of an employer, the Baron Tripeaud, who has made me what I now am—a good-for-nothing scamp."

"M. Hardy's men are coming—you are their comrade—you have no interest in deceiving them—they will believe you; so lend me your assistance to induce them to make their decision——"

"As to what?"

"To leave the factory where they are becoming enervated, and getting so selfish as to forget the wrongs and injuries of their brothers——"

"But if they quit the factory, how are they to get a living?"

"Oh, they shall be provided for until the great day."

"And what are they to do till then?"

"What you did last night,—drink, laugh, and sing; and then all the work they will have to do will be to learn the military exercises in their rooms."

"And what induces the workmen to come here?"

"Some one has already spoken to them—placards have been distributed amongst them, in which they are reproached for their indifference towards their brothers. Well, now, will you support me?"

"I will; and the more because I am really beginning to support myself with considerable difficulty. Céphyse was the only person in the world I cared about. I feel I am in a horrible downhill condition and you are shoving me down still lower; but let the ball roll! if one must go the devil, it is of very little consequence by what means. Let us drink!"

"Yes; let's drink to our jolly next night's revel—the last was but a mere rehearsal."

"What stuff are you made off—you! I look at you; but I have not seen you once, even for a moment, blush or smile, or appear moved or excited; but, then, you are like a man made of cast iron."

"I am no longer fifteen years of age, and I must have something quite different to make me laugh; but, to-night, I shall laugh—yes, to-night."

"I do not know if it is the brandy, or what it is, but, devil rock me, if you don't make me shudder when you say you shall laugh to-night!"

So saying the young man rose from his seat, staggering as he did so; he was getting drunk again. There was a knock at the door.

"Come in!"

The landlord entered.

"What is it?"

"There is a young man below, who says his name's Olivier; he asks for M. Morok."

"I am he; tell him to come up."

The landlord left the room.

"This is one of your men, but he is alone," said Morok, whose coarse features expressed disappointment. "Alone! that surprises me. I expected several. Do you know him?"

"Olivier?—yes; a fair young man, I think."

"We shall see; here he is."

And a young man, with an open countenance, at once bold and intelligent, entered the little room.

"Ah, Couche-tout-Nu!" he exclaimed, at the sight of Morok's companion.

"Yes; here I am. Why, it is an age since we met, Olivier!"

"But easily explained, my boy, as we do not work in the same factory."

"But are you alone?" asked Morok.

And pointing to Couche-tout-Nu, he added,—

"You may speak before him—he is one of ourselves. But, again, why are you alone?"

"I am alone; but I have come in my comrades' name."

"Ah!" said Morok, with a sigh of satisfaction. "They consent."

"They refuse; and so do I."

"What! refuse? Then they have no more firmness than women," exclaimed Morok, grinding his teeth with rage.

"Listen!" said Olivier, calmly; "we have received your letters—seen your agent: we have had the proof that he was, in fact, affiliated with the secret societies, with several of whose members we are acquainted."

"Well; and why do you hesitate?"

"In the first place, we have no evidence that these societies are ready for a movement."

"But I tell you they are."

"He—he—says it," said Couche-tout-Nu, stammering; "and I confirm it. Forward! on, my boys!"

"That is not sufficient," continued Olivier; "and, moreover, we have reflected upon it. For the last eight days the workshop has been divided! Yesterday we had a very warm, and even painful, discussion; but this morning old M. Simon came to us, and we talked the affair over with him. He convinced us, and now we shall wait—if the outbreak comes—then we shall see——"

"Is this your final resolve?"

"Most decidedly."

"Silence!" exclaimed Couche-tout-Nu, suddenly, listening and trying to steady himself on his tottering legs; "there is a noise as if of a crowd of people at a distance."

And there was heard a murmuring sound which grew louder every instant, and by degrees increased into a decided tumult.

"What can it be?" said Olivier, surprised.

"Now," said Morok, with a sinister smile, "I remember the landlord told me when I came in that there was a great ferment in the village against the factory. If you and your comrades had been separated from the other workmen of M. Hardy, as I believed, these people who are beginning to clamour would have been with you instead of against you."

"This rendezvous, then, was an ambush contrived to excite one party of M. Hardy's workmen against the other!" exclaimed Olivier; "and you were in hopes that we should have made common cause with those persons who have been excited against the factory, and that——"

The young man could not continue. A terrific burst of mingled cries, hisses, and yells, made the public-house re-echo again.

At the same moment the owner of the cabaret burst into the room, exclaiming,—

"Gentlemen, is there any person here belonging to the manufactory of M. Hardy?"

"I do," said Olivier.

"Then it is all up with you; the Loups have come in crowds inquiring for the Dévorans from M. Hardy's, and they desire to fight out their quarrel; unless, indeed, the Dévorans are willing to forsake the manufactory they at present belong to and join with them."

"A regular snare," cried Olivier, regarding Morok and Couche-tout-Nu with a threatening air; "had my comrades chanced to be here, we should have been led into a pretty scrape."

"Who do you mean," said Couche-tout-Nu, almost gasping for breath, "when you talk of laying snares and leading you into mischief? You cannot allude to me, Olivier? Impossible!"

"Let the Dévorans come out and fight us like men, or let them join with the Loups!" burst in one simultaneous shout from the infuriated crowd who were pressing to attack the house.

"Come, come!" exclaimed the master of the inn, as without giving Olivier time to reply, he seized him by the arm, and drawing him towards a window which opened on to the roof of a low pent-house, he cried,—

"Jump from this window on to the ledge below, then slide down, and gain the open fields, there is still time for you to do so."

And seeing the young man hesitate, the terrified landlord added,—

"Why, what chance have you against at least two hundred persons? A minute longer, and you are lost. Do you hear them? They have entered the court-yard, and are coming upstairs."

And he was right; for at this instant the cries, yells, groans, and other discordant noises, were heard with redoubled violence, while the wooden staircase leading to the first floor shook beneath the rapid trampling of the fierce crowd who hurried upwards, exclaiming in tones of sharp defiance, momentarily brought nearer and nearer,—

"Let the Dévorans turn out and fight us like men!"

"Olivier," cried Couche-tout-Nu, almost sobered by the pressing danger, "fly, save yourself while you can!"

But scarcely had he uttered the words when the doors which led from the large saloon to the small apartment occupied by himself and party were dashed open with a fearful crash.

"Here they are!" ejaculated the terrified landlord, clasping his hands in wild affright; then, running to Olivier, he almost forced him out of the window, for the young man struggled violently to resist him, and even remained with one leg hanging over the sill of the casement till the landlord forcibly pushed him on to the projecting pent-house, from whence he at once dropped to the ground.

Having closed the window, the landlord returned towards Morok just at the moment when the latter was leaving the room to proceed to the large saloon into which the leaders of the Loup party had just forced their way, while their companions were loudly vociferating on the staircase as well as in the court-yard.

Eight or ten of these rash, unthinking men, who were, unknown to themselves, being urged to all this disorder and outrage, first rushed into the saloon armed with thick bludgeons, while their countenances were alike inflamed by rage and intoxication.

A quarryman of gigantic height and herculean proportions, with an old red handkerchief tied around his head and hanging in tattered morsels on his shoulders, while a miserable, half-worn goat-skin clothed his chest and shoulders, appeared to direct the movements of the party. He bore in his hand a heavy crowbar, and, advancing with fierce and fiery aspect, glaring eyeballs, and threatening gestures, made directly for the adjoining room, affecting to drive back Morok, and exclaiming in a voice of thunder,—

"Where are the Dévorans? the Loups are ready to fall upon and devour them!"

The landlord quickly opened the chamber door, saying,—

"There is no one here, my friends, see, look, and satisfy yourselves there is nobody."

"No more there is," returned the quarryman, much surprised after having thrown a hasty glance round the room. "Where are they then? We were told there were, at least, fifteen or more of them here. Well, if we had found them, we would have compelled them either to proceed with us at once to attack the manufactory, or else come to a pitched battle, which would have been a smasher for them."

"Never mind," chimed in a second voice, "if they are not here now, they will be sure to come, so we will have a little patience and wait for their arrival."

"Yes, yes," resounded from many voices, "let us wait."

"Ah, to be sure!" cried another party; "we shall have a good view of each other."

"If the Loups are anxious to behold the Dévorans," said Morok, "why do they not go and howl defiance around the manufactory where these atheistical miscreants are to be found? Then, at their first summons, their enemies would come forth and join in the fight so much desired."

"Fighting!" repeated Couche-tout-Nu, mechanically; "would there then be a battle?"

"There would," replied Morok, "unless, indeed, the Loups fear to engage in open combat with the Dévorans."

"Then, by way of shewing you whether we fear or not," exclaimed the gigantic quarryman, in a voice of thunder, and advancing towards Morok as he spake, "you shall go along with us, and then you shall witness our close and deadly encounter."

An infuriated cry arose from the rest of the party of, "Who dares say the Loups fear to meet the Dévorans?"

"It would be the first time if they did!"

"A fight, a fight! and let that end the quarrel!"

"It is time to make things square and equal. Why should we have so many grievances to endure, while they are pampered up, and enjoy every comfort?"

"Have they not dared to say, that the quarrymen were a set of stupid brutes, good for nothing but to work amid the machinery of the quarries, like so many turnspits?"

"And that they (the Dévorans) would strip off the skin from our (the Loups) backs, and make themselves caps with them!"

"Why, they are nothing but brute beasts themselves," chimed in an emissary of the abbé's; "a set of graceless pagans who never, any more than their families, shew their faces at mass. Shameful!—shameful! Enough to bring God's curse upon us all."

"And as our excellent curé said from his pulpit, such conduct would surely have the effect of drawing down the vengeance of heaven, and bringing the cholera upon us as a scourge and righteous punishment for such neglect of duty."

"That's true enough! I heard the curé with my own ears say so from his pulpit."

"So did all our wives!"

"Down with the Dévorans! We are not going to be destroyed by cholera through their sinfulness."

"A fight! a fight!" screamed out a full chorus of discordant voices.

"Off to the manufactory, then, my brave Loups!" exclaimed Morok, in a stentorian voice,—“Off to the manufactory, I say!!”

"Ay, ay! to the manufactory!—to the manufactory!" re-echoed the crowd, with infuriated shouts; and by this time both saloon and staircase were filled with a dense mass of half-maddened creatures, wrought up to any act of outrage or violence.

Their frenzied cries recalled Couche-tout-Nu completely to himself, and whispering Morok, he said,—

"What do these men purpose doing? There will be bloodshed and murder. I'll have nothing to do with it."

"We shall have time to give the alarm at the factory," replied Morok; "we will slip away on the road thither." Then, calling in a loud voice to the landlord, who was all aghast at this uproar and direful confusion, he said,—

"Bring brandy, that we may drink to the health of the brave Loups. I'll stand the treat!"

With these words he flung some silver towards the landlord, who soon disappeared, and as quickly returned, bearing several bottles of brandy, and a quantity of glasses.

"What do you mean by offering us glasses?" cried Morok. "Do you suppose that friends, such as we are, drink to each other in glasses?" And knocking the cork out of the bottle, he held the neck to his lips; and after having drunk, passed it to the gigantic and ferocious-looking quarryman.

"With all my heart!" exclaimed the latter. "Here's to our friend and his treat; and I say, he's a cur that refuses. This is a prime whet to sharpen the fangs of the Loups."

"Help yourselves, friends!" said Morok, distributing the bottles among the crowd.

"I tell you," murmured Couche-tout-Nu, comprehending, in spite of his intoxicated condition, all the dangers to be apprehended from men so unnaturally excited, "this will end in blood;" but his words passed unheeded: and having drank their fill, the riotous mass quitted the premises, to proceed, shouting and hallooing, towards the factory of M. Hardy.

Such of the workpeople, and other inhabitants of the village, who had kept aloof from these hostile measures (and they formed a large majority), did not shew themselves as the tumultuous rabble passed through the principal street; but a large body of women, rendered fanatical by the preaching of the abbé, cheered them on, and encouraged the formidable band of insurgents, by loud and clamorous notes of approval.

At the head of the rioters marched the herculean quarryman, brandishing his formidable crowbar, while behind him flocked, in wild disorder, a crowd of half-drunken, desperate men, some carrying bludgeons, others stones, or any other missile they could collect; their brains on fire with the copious libations of brandy, so unsparingly dealt out to them, they were in a state of almost frantic excitement, while the expression of their flushed and inflamed countenances was fearful to behold; and the most frightful consequences might be expected from beings so completely at the mercy of the fiercest and most ungoverned passions.

Holding each other by the arm, and walking four or five abreast, the Loups wrought themselves up still more, by singing in loud voices their different war-songs, repeating the various choruses with increasing wildness and savage exultation. The last couplet concludes as follows :—

“ Let’s on, brave boys, with courage bold,
 Let’s raise our arm with strength ;
 Prudence, avaunt ! for now behold,
 We face our foes at length !
 Sons of a king of glorious name,
 Shame blanches not our cheek !
 Then let us bravely seek,
 Or death, or lasting fame.
 Sons of King Solomon the great are we,
 Then, let one daring effort see Us dead or free ! ”

Morok and Couche-tout-Nu had disappeared while the tumultuous crowd were rushing in swarms from the public-house to repair to the factory of M. Hardy.

CHAPTER XXXV.

THE “ MAISON COMMUNE.”

WHILST the Loups, as we have seen, were preparing for a furious attack against the Dévorans, the factory of M. Hardy presented the appearance that morning of a holyday quite in accordance with the serenity of the sky ; for the wind was northerly, and the weather cold enough for a fine day in March.

Nine o’clock had just struck by the clock of the Maison Commune of the workmen, which was separated from the workshops by a wide walk planted with trees.

The rising sun threw its beams on the imposing mass of buildings situated a league from Paris, in a spot as pleasant, as healthy, and whence could be seen the wooded and picturesque banks which on this side command a view of the great city.

Nothing could be more plain and cheerful than the Maison Commune of the work-people. The roof of red tiles came beyond the white walls, intersected here and there by large courses of bricks, which contrasted agreeably with the green colour of the outside blinds of the first and second stories.

These buildings exposed to the south and east were surrounded by a vast garden of ten acres in extent ; in some places, planted by trees in quincunxes ; and in others, in kitchen-gardens and orchards.

Before we continue this description, which may, perhaps, seem almost magical, let us first declare, that the marvels of which we are about to sketch the picture ought not to be considered as utopian or dreams ; but, on the contrary, nothing is more true and actual, and, let us add, and not only add, but prove (and in these times, such a proof will give singular weight and interest to the assertion), these marvels were the result of an excellent speculation, and eventually produced an investment as profitable as certain.

To undertake a worthy, useful, and great work ; to imbue a considerable number of human creatures with an ideal state of comfort, when compared with the frightful and almost murderous destiny to which they are almost condemned ; to instruct them, and elevate them in their own eyes ; to induce them to prefer to the low habits of the public-house, or rather to those intoxicating tastes which these unhappy persons seek there to their ruin, in order to escape the consciousness of their miserable destiny ; to make them prefer to this the pleasures of the mind, the amusements of the arts ; to make mankind moral through their happiness ; in a word, thanks to a noble commencement to an example of easy copy, to take a place amongst the benefactors of society, and at the same time to find it a most remunerative matter ;—all this appears fabulous. Such was, however, the secret of the marvels of which we write.

* * * * *

Let us now enter the interior of the factory.

Agricola, ignorant of the disappearance of the poor Mayeux, gave himself up to the brightest hopes when he thought of Angèle ; and finished his toilette with no small care, in order to go and see his betrothed.

Let us say two words as to the lodgings which the smith occupied in the Maison Commune at the incredibly low price of sixty-five francs a-year, like the other single men.

This lodging was on the second-floor, and consisted of a very nice bed-chamber, and closet, looking towards the south and to the garden. The floor made of deal was perfectly white ; the iron bedstead had a palliasse of maze-leaves, an excellent mattress, with soft blankets ; a gas-pipe and a calorific tube gave, when needed, light and comfortable warmth to the apartment, which was decorated with a pretty Indian paper, with curtains to match. A chest of drawers, a walnut-tree table, several chairs, &c., a small book-case, completed Agricola's furniture ; whilst in the closet, which was large and light, was a chest to hold clothes, a table for articles of washing, and a large zinc basin, over which was a tap, which supplied water at will.

If we compare this agreeable, wholesome, and convenient apartment, to the dark, dismal, cold, and dilapidated attic, for which the worthy fellow paid ninety francs a-year in his mother's house ; to reach which, he had to walk every night more than a league and a half, we may understand the sacrifice which his affection made for that excellent woman.

Agricola, after having cast a proud and satisfactory glance in his looking-glass, after combing his moustache and large impériale, left the chamber to go and join Angèle in the common laundry. The passage along which he passed was large, lighted up from above, and boarded with deal, which was kept as white as snow.

In spite of some seeds of discord thrown some time since by M. Hardy's enemies in the midst of this association of workmen until then so fraternally united, there were heard joyful songs in almost every room along the corridor ; and Agricola, as he passed by several open doors, exchanged a hearty "good morning" with many of his comrades.

The smith ran quickly down the staircase, crossed the bowling-green planted with trees, in the midst of which a fountain threw out sparkling jets of water, and reached the other wing of the building. There was the room in which a party of wives and daughters of the associated workmen, who were not employed in the factory, made up all the furniture for the apartments. This arrangement, added to the vast saving which was made in the purchase of the materials wholesale, being carried out in the factory by the Association, reduced immensely the retail cost of every article.

After having crossed the linen-room, a very large apartment looking into the garden, very airy in the summer and very warm in the winter, Agricola went and rapped at the door of Angèle's mother's room.

If we have a few words to say with respect to this apartment, which was on the first floor looking to the east, and with a view of the garden, it is because it offered a sample of the housekeeper's dwelling in the Association at a rent still incredibly low of 125 francs by the year.*

A sort of entrance from the corridor led to a very large apartment, on each side of which was a chamber somewhat smaller intended for a family when the sons or daughters were too big to sleep any longer in one of the two dormitories arranged like the dormitories at schools, and intended for children of both sexes. Every night the care of these dormitories was intrusted to the father or mother of a family belonging to the Association.

The apartment to which we now refer was, like all the rest, entirely destitute of any kitchen materials, all the meals being had in common in another part of the building, and, therefore, was kept with great order and cleanliness. A good-sized carpet, a comfortable arm-chair, some pretty cups and saucers on a shelf of deal nicely varnished, several pictures hung from the walls, a clock of gilt bronze, a bed, a chest of drawers, and secrétaire of mahogany, announced that the lodgers in these rooms added some trifling superfluities to their necessary furniture.

Angèle, who from this time may be considered as the betrothed of Agricola, justified in every particular the flattering portrait drawn by the smith at his interview with poor La Mayeux. This charming young girl was about seventeen years of age, dressed with equal simplicity and neatness, was seated beside her mother. When Agricola entered, she blushed slightly as she saw him.

* M. Adolphe Bobierre, in a small work lately published (De l'Air considéré sous le Rapport de la Salubrité), enters into singular and actual details as to the indispensable necessity for the renewal of air for the preservation of health. It results from the experience of science, that in order to preserve a man in a wholesome condition, he requires six to ten cubic metres (eight to twelve yards) of fresh and renewed air every hour. One shudders, then, in reflecting on the dark and stifling workshops where such quantities of workmen are crowded together. Amongst the excellent conclusions of M. Bobierre's pamphlet we may quote the following, joining with him in calling the attention of the Council of Health, which daily does so much good, to this, "As soon as any workshop has more than ten workmen, it should be inspected by delegates of the Committee of Health, who should certify that its arrangements are not such as to affect the health of the artisans who are employed there."

ANGELE AND AGRICOLA.

"Mademoiselle," said the smith, "I have come to fulfil my promise, if your mother consents."

"Certainly, M. Agricola, I consent," replied the young girl's mother, cordially; "she would not go and see over the Maison Commune and the buildings either with her father, her brother, or with me, that she might have the pleasure of seeing it to-day (Sunday) with you. So much the better for her, as you, who talk so well, can do the honours of the house to her who is a stranger in it, and for the last hour she has been waiting for you with the greatest impatience."

"Excuse me, mademoiselle," said Agricola, gaily, "whilst I was thinking of the pleasure of seeing you I lost an hour. This is the only excuse I can offer."

"Ah, mother!" said the young girl to her mother, in a tone of gentle reproach, and blushing deeply, "why did you say that?"

"Is it true or not? I did not say it reproachfully, quite the contrary. Go, my dear, M. Agricola will explain to you better than I can how deeply all the work-people of the factory are indebted to M. Hardy."

"M. Agricola," said Angèle, tying the ribands of her very pretty cap, "what a pity your good little adopted sister is not with us!"

"What, La Mayeux! You are right, mademoiselle; but it is only a pleasure delayed, the visit she paid us yesterday was not the last."

The young girl, after having kissed her mother, went out, taking Agricola's arm.

"Indeed, M. Agricola," said Angèle, "if you knew how much I have been surprised when I came into this nice house, I who had been accustomed to see so much misery amongst the poor working people in the country—misery which I have shared too—whilst here every body seems so happy, so contented! It is like a fairy tale. Really, I think I must be dreaming; and when I ask my mother for an explanation of this fairy tale, she replied, 'M. Agricola will explain all this to you.'"

"Do you know why the gratifying task gives me so much pleasure, mademoiselle?" said Agricola, with a tone at once serious and tender. "It is because nothing could happen more à propos."

"How, M. Agricola?"

"To shew you ~~this house~~, and point out to you all the advantages of our Association, is as if I were to say to you, 'Here, mademoiselle, the artisan, certain of the present and certain of the future, is not compelled, like so many of his fraternity, frequently to renounce the sweetest hopes of the heart—the desire of choosing a companion for life, in the fear of uniting his own misery to another misery.'"

Angèle looked down and blushed.

"Here the workmen may, without uneasiness, give himself up to the hope of the sweet enjoyment of a family, quite sure that he will not hereafter be heart-broken at the sight of the horrible privations of those who are most dear to him: here, thanks to order, labour, the right application of each man's ability, men, women, and children, live happy and content. In a word, in order to explain all this to you," added Agricola, smiling, and with a most tender look, "it is to prove to you, mademoiselle, that here nothing can be more reasonable than to love—nothing wiser than to marry."

"M. Agricola," replied Angèle, with a voice full of emotion, and blushing still deeper, "suppose we begin our walk."

"Instantly, mademoiselle," replied the smith, delighted at the agitation he had caused in this ingenuous breast; "here we are close to the dormitory of the little girls—the little warblers who have left their nests this long time; let us go there."

"Willingly, M. Agricola."

The young smith and Angèle entered at once into a spacious dormitory, closely resembling that of a well-regulated school. The small iron beds were symmetrically arranged; at each extremity were the beds of two married women who had families, and who, in turns, were the superintendants.

"Oh, how nicely this dormitory is arranged, M. Agricola! how beautifully clean! Who attends to it so carefully?"

"The children themselves. There are no servants here, and there is an immense rivalry existing amongst these infants as to who can best make the beds, and it amuses them quite as much as if they were making their doll's bed. Little girls, as you must be aware, are very fond of playing at housekeeping. Well, here, they play at it in earnest, and it is remarkably well done——"

"Ah! I understand; their natural inclinations for certain amusements are brought into play here."

"That is the whole secret, and you will see them in each department very usefully employed, and overjoyed at the importance which their occupations give them."

"Ah! M. Agricola," said Angèle, with timidity, "when we compare these nice dormitories, so healthy and so warm, to those wretched garrets, cold as ice, where the children are huddled together on wretched palliasses, frozen with cold, as is the case with almost all the working people in our provinces——"

"And in Paris, mademoiselle, it is still worse."

"Oh! how good, generous, and, moreover, how rich, M. Hardy must be, to spend so much money—in doing so much good!"

"I shall very much astonish you, mademoiselle," said Agricola, smiling; "so much so, that, perhaps, you will not believe me."

"Why not, M. Agricola?"

"Assuredly there is not a kinder-hearted, more generous man in the world, than M. Hardy; he does good for the sake of good, without thinking of his interest; but, suppose, mademoiselle, he was the most selfish, interested, avaricious man in the world, he would find an enormous profit in making us all as happy and comfortable as we are."

"Can that be possible, M. Agricola? You say so, and I must believe you; but if to do so much good is so easy, and even so profitable, why is there not more of it done?"

"Ah, mademoiselle! three conditions are required, very rarely combined in the same person: Knowledge—power—will."

"Alas! yes, those who know perhaps cannot."

"And those who can do not know, or will not."

"But how does M. Hardy find so much advantage in the good which he enables you to enjoy?"

"That I will explain to you presently, mademoiselle."

"Oh, what a delightful, sweet smell of fruit!" said Angèle, suddenly.

"It is the general fruit-room, which is close by; and I will bet a wager that you will see, near at hand, several of our small birds of the dormitory employed, not in stealing, but at work."

Agricola opened a door and led Angèle into a good-sized room, with shelves, on which winter fruits were nicely arranged, and several children from seven to eight years of age, clad neatly and warmly, and rosy with health, were gaily employed, under the superintendence of a woman, in picking out and examining the spoiled fruit.

"You see," said Agricola, "that every where, and as much as possible, we employ children: these occupations are amusements for them, and suit the stir and activity of their age, and so the time of women and young girls is devoted to much more useful occupation."

"True, M. Agricola; and really how very wisely all this is arranged!"

"And if you saw the little children in the kitchen, you would be surprised at the services they render; with one or two women to direct them they do the work of eight or ten servants."

"Why," said Angèle, smiling, "at this age children are so fond of playing at preparing the dinner that these must be delighted."

"Precisely so; and under the idea of playing at gardening, it is they who in the garden weed the ground, gather the fruit and vegetables, water the flowers, rake the walks, &c.; in a word, this army of working youngsters, who usually await ten or twelve years of age before they can be of any service, are here made very useful; and except three hours school-time—quite enough for them—from the age of six or seven years their amusements are, in fact, serious occupations, and, in truth, these dear little things, by saving the more powerful arms, which are exercised for their living, earn more than they cost; and then, indeed, mademoiselle, do you not think that in the sight of infancy thus mingling with all labours, there is something soft, pure, and almost sacred, which puts a right restraint on words and actions? The coarsest man respects childhood."

"The more I reflect, the more I see how greatly all this is calculated to effect general benefit!" said Angèle, with warmth.

"But it has not been effected without trouble; there was a routine to establish, prejudices to subdue.—But look, Mademoiselle Angèle, here is the common kitchen," added the smith, with a smile; "is it not as imposing as the kitchen of a barrack or some large boarding-school?"

In truth, the kitchen of the Maison Commune was immense. All the utensils shone with brightness, and, thanks to arrangements as remarkable as they are economical in modern science (always denied to the poor classes, to whom they are of most importance, because they can only be carried on upon a large scale), not only were the fire-place and the stoves kept alight with a quantity of fuel, half as small as that which each private kitchen would singly have used; but the excess of heat is employed by means of a calorific, admirably managed to diffuse an equal temperature throughout all the chambers of the Maison Commune.

There also, under the direction of two active women, the children were usefully employed. Nothing could be more comic than the serious looks of the children at work in the kitchen; and it was the same in the bakehouse, where they made, at a vast reduction of cost (by buying the wheat wholesale), that excellent household bread, a wholesome and nutritive mixture of pure wheat flour and rye, so preferable to that white and light bread which too often acquires those qualities by the aid of unwholesome substances.

"Good day, Madame Bertrand," said Agricola, gaily, to a kind-looking matron who was gravely contemplating the slow evolutions of several spits worthy of Gamacho's wedding, so gloriously were they laden with pieces of beef, mutton, and veal, which were beginning to assume a delicious gold-brown colour that was most appetizing. "Good day, Madame Bertrand," said Agricola, "according to custom, I cannot pass the kitchen door; and I wish to introduce this young lady to its acquaintance, as she has only been here for a few days."

"Oh! pray look in and admire — particularly that young party round the table — see how industrious and well-behaved they are."

So saying, the matron pointed with a large basting-ladle she held in her hand, as a sort of culinary sceptre, to a group of children of both sexes deeply absorbed in the various occupations intrusted to them, such as peeling potatoes, picking herbs, &c.

"Why, we shall have a second Belshazzar's feast, eh, Madame Bertrand?" said Agricola, smiling.

"To be sure we shall, my lad; why, are not all our meals feasts? Here is to-day's bill of fare. Good vegetable soup, with bouillon, roast beef, and potatoes; salad, cheese, and fruit. Oh! but I forgot, to-day being Sunday, we are to have baked plum-puddings, which are now being prepared by Mother Denis at the bakehouse; and, I doubt not, but that just now the oven and the puddings are alike hot!"

"Upon my word, Madame Bertrand, your description makes me feel desperately hungry," said Agricola, sportively. "Ah! it is very easy to know when it has been your turn to preside over the kitchen!" added he, in a flattering tone.

"Go along with you, making game of an old woman," said the chief of the victualling department, gaily.

"One thing surprises me above all, M. Agricola," said Angèle to her companion, as they proceeded onwards; "it is to compare the insufficiency and unwholesome food of the working class in our part of the country with what I see here."

"And yet we don't spend more than twenty-five sous a-day in being far better fed here than we could be for three times the sum in Paris."

"Really! it seems incredible; and how do you account for this wonderful advantage?"

"It is one of the magical wonders produced by the wand of M. Hardy. I will explain it all to you directly."

"Oh, how I long to see this good M. Hardy!"

"Then you will soon have your wish gratified — perhaps to-day — for we expect him every minute; but here we are at the refectory, which I believe you have never seen, since your family, like most others, prefer having their meals sent to them. Just see what a very nice, cheerful room it is: looking out on the garden, and exactly opposite the fountain."

The refectory was a long, well-constructed building, having eight large windows looking out upon a well-kept garden, tables, covered with highly polished oil-cloth, were ranged down each side, so that during winter the room served as a general rendezvous for the different workmen who, when the labours of the day were ended, preferred assembling together here to passing the evening alone, and where they amused themselves according to their several tastes, either in reading, conversation with cards, or any light occupation; here, in an apartment well warmed and brilliantly lighted by gas, they refreshed and recreated themselves against the morrow's toil.

"But," said Agricola, "you will be better pleased with this building when I tell you that twice a-week we have a sort of ball here, and on alternate evenings we get up a concert."

"Do you, indeed?"

"Yes, I assure you," replied the smith, with a sort of pride, "we have amongst us several excellent practical musicians, quite able to furnish the necessary music for our balls; and then, twice a-week, we practise singing all together, men, women, and children.* Unfortunately, during the past week, our concerts have been interrupted by some unpleasant and unexpected disturbances in the factory."

"How charming it must be to hear so many voices all singing together!"

"I can assure you it produces a very fine effect, and M. Hardy has always greatly encouraged a mode of recreation, which he says (and with much reason) exercises so powerful an influence on the mind and manners."

"For a whole winter he had here, at his own expense, two pupils of the celebrated M. Wilhelm, since which time our singing has greatly improved; and really, Mademoiselle Angèle, without any vanity, I may venture to say, that it is impossible to imagine any thing more affecting than to hear upwards of two hundred voices chanting forth in one harmonious strain some stirring hymn in favour of liberty and labour — you must hear them, and then I feel sure you will agree that there is grandeur and sublimity, almost heart-stirring, in this simultaneous burst of full, sonorous sounds."

"Indeed, I doubt it not; but how delightful to live in such a place as this, where all is joy and pleasure — for labour, thus blended with amusement, must cease to be a task, and create nothing but happiness and real enjoyment!"

"Alas!" replied Agricola, "we have here our share in the common lot of griefs and sorrows. Do you see that building standing out at a distance from the factory?"

"Yes; what is it?"

"Our infirmary; happily, thanks to our wholesome food, pure air, and excellent regulations, it is very seldom full. An annual collection

* We were among the number of those admitted to the admirable concerts of the "Orphéon," where more than 1000 workpeople, men, women, and children, sang with marvellous precision and effect.

among ourselves enables us to have a most skilful doctor; besides which, we have a sort of club, so managed, that in case of illness, a member of it receives two-thirds of what he would earn if in good health."

"What a very excellent plan! But please to tell me, M. Agricola, what is that I see on the other side of the greensward?"

"It is the wash-house and laundry, where there is a continual supply of hot and cold water;—the building you perceive adjoining is the drying-house;—farther still are the granaries and stables for the use of the horses employed in the manufactory."

"And now, M. Agricola, that you have described all these wonders to me, are you able to tell me the secret by which they are brought about?"

"In less than ten minutes, mademoiselle, all that will be made clear to you!"

Unfortunately the ardent curiosity of Angèle was not fated to be immediately gratified. The young couple were now close to a sort of open trellis-work which bounded the garden on the side where the principal alley ran, separating the workshops from the Maison Commune. All at once, the distant sound of trumpets and other martial music came swelling on the breeze; then the quick tread of two rapidly approaching horses, followed by the appearance of a general officer, mounted on a handsome long-tailed, coal-black charger, decked with crimson housings. The officer wore the style of dress adopted under Napoleon, that is to say, he had high boots reaching above his knees, and white breeches; while his blue uniform glittered with its rich golden embroidery—the broad red riband of the Legion of Honour was tied round his right epaulette, which presented one blaze of silver; while his hat, deeply bordered with gold, displayed the floating white plume, the peculiar distinction of the maréchals of France.

A more imposing specimen of a brave, chivalric soldier, accoutred in military costume, and mounted on his warlike steed, could not be presented to the eye.

When Maréchal Simon (for it was he himself) reached the place where Angèle and Agricola were standing, he pulled his horse up suddenly, descended lightly, and threw the reins to a servant in livery, who followed him on horseback.

"Where shall I wait, M. le Duc?" demanded the groom.

"At the end of the alley," replied the Maréchal. Then taking off his hat with an air of respectful deference, he walked quickly on, still holding it in his hand to meet some person who was as yet unseen by either Angèle or Agricola.

The object of the Maréchal's eager, yet deferential search, now made his appearance at the other end of the walk—it was an old man, with a countenance at once energetic and intelligent; he wore a neat, clean blouse, a cloth cap covered his long white locks, while, his hands tucked in his pockets, he was contentedly smoking an old meerschaum.

"A good day, and many of them, my dear father," cried the Maréchal, embracing with all the warmth of boyish affection his aged parent, who, after holding him in a long and tight embrace, exclaimed, observing that he continued to keep his hat off:—

MARECHAL SIMON AND HIS FATHER.

"Come, come, my boy! put on your hat — no ceremony with your old father, I beg! But," added he, smilingly, "how gay you are to-day!"

"My dear father, I have just come from a review close by, and I availed myself of the opportunity to pay you an early visit."

"Quite right! But then I hope your coming will not deprive me of the pleasure of seeing my dear little grand-daughters."

"Not at all, my dear father; they are coming — the carriage will bring them."

"But what has occurred, my good lad, to make you so unusually serious to-day?"

"The truth is, dear father," replied the Maréchal, with an appearance of deep and painful emotion, "I have to speak to you upon some very serious subjects."

"Come indoors with me, then," said the old man, growing uneasy.

And with these words, the Maréchal and his father, turning in the direction of the circuitous path, disappeared from the view of Angèle and Agricola. As for Angèle, she could not restrain her surprise at finding that a glittering general officer, styled by his attendant "M. le Duc," could be son to an old working man, dressed in a common blouse. After trying in vain to repress her curiosity, she looked towards Agricola with a bewildered air, and said,—

"M. Agricola — pray tell me — this old man in the blouse ——"

"Is the father of the Maréchal Duc de Ligny, the friend — yes," continued Agricola, in a tone of deep feeling, "I may presume to say, the friend of my father, who for upwards of twenty years fought under his command."

"Wonderful!" said Angèle; "so high in rank, yet so tender and respectful to his old father! Ah, the Maréchal must possess a noble heart! But why does he permit his father to work for his living?"

"Because that father would not quit his employment or the manufactory for any inducement that could be held out to him; — he was born a workman, and a workman he will die — spite of his son being a duke and a marshal of France."

CHAPTER XXXVI.

THE SECRET.

WHEN Angèle had recovered from the very natural astonishment caused by the arrival of Maréchal Simon, Agricola said to her smilingly,—

"I must not avail myself of this little interruption to our conversation to evade my promise of telling you the secret of all the wonders of our Maison Commune."

"Indeed, M. Agricola," replied Angèle, "I should not have allowed you to escape its performance. I am already too much interested in all I have seen and heard."

"Then please to listen attentively, whilst I explain how M. Hardy, by the simple witchcraft of employing three cabalistical words, has brought all these marvels to bear: the words gifted with such magic power are—Association, Community, and Fraternity. We have learned to know and to feel the full value of these words, which have effected advantages equally great both to M. Hardy and ourselves."

"That is the point which strikes me as so very remarkable, M. Agricola."

"Suppose, mademoiselle, that instead of being what he is, M. Hardy had been a close-minded, hard-hearted man, thinking merely of his own gain, he would reason thus, 'What do I require to make my manufactory return a good profit?—first-rate workmen, strict economy in the raw material, judicious occupation of the time of the work-people; in fact, a rigid attention to the most economical mode of producing the article required, in order to be enabled to offer it as cheaply as possible in the market, with as great perfection as attainable, in order to obtain the best prices given.'"

"Certainly, M. Agricola, no manufacturer could desire more!"

"Well, then, mademoiselle, all these points might have been accomplished, as they have been: but now, in this manner, in merely a speculative view, M. Hardy would have said, 'If my work-people live at a distance from the manufactory, it will cost them both time and labour to come and go, as they must necessarily rise earlier in the morning, it will diminish their hours of sleep; and to take from the repose so necessary to recruit the strength of a working man is a false calculation; in proportion as the health of the artisan suffered, so would his work. Then, during severe weather, the long journey to the factory would be rendered still worse; the workman arriving wet, cold, and weary, what could be expected from his labour?'"

"That is unfortunately but too true, M. Agricola; when I was at Lille, I often reached the manufactory wet to the skin, from having been exposed all the way to a cold, drenching rain, and sometimes I could scarcely work from the chilliness and shivering it brought on!"

"Well, then, Mademoiselle Angèle, the calculating manufacturer would say, 'Now, by lodging my work-people close to the factory, I obviate this difficulty. Let us calculate: the married artisan pays as an average price, in Paris, about 250 francs (10*l.*) a-year; for that he has two miserable rooms, with a small closet, the whole dark, confined, and ill ventilated, in some close, unhealthy neighbourhood. There he lives, cramped up with his sickly, squalid family, himself ailing and enfeebled, and what labour can be expected from a weakened frame? As for the single workmen, who require a smaller lodging, they usually pay about 150 francs (6*l.*) a-year. Now just let us reckon: I employ 146 married workmen; these men then pay, altogether, for the wretched dog-holes they inhabit, 36,500 francs per annum. I also employ 115 unmarried men, who also pay in the whole 17,280 francs annually, making a total of 50,000 francs for rent, the interest of a million.'"

"Really, M. Agricola! who would think that so immense a sum could be produced by uniting the utrice of so many humble lodgings?"

"Yes, it is even so, mademoiselle,—50,000 francs a-year! the interest producible by the investment of a million of francs. 'So then,' says our speculator, 'in order to persuade my workmen to give up their dwellings in Paris, I will offer them great advantages; I will even reduce what they now pay for rent to one half, and instead of unwholesome chambers, they shall have large, airy apartments, with facilities for having them both warmed and lighted at a very small cost; thus 146 married men will pay me only 125 francs for rent, and 115 single men, 75 francs; making a total of from 26 to 27,000 francs. A building large enough to accommodate such a number of persons will cost me at the most 500,000 francs.* I shall then, at least, get five per cent for my money, which will be a safe investment, since I can always pay myself out of the wages of my work-people.'"

"Ah, M. Agricola! I begin to see how advantageous it is to do good, if even considered in a pecuniary light!"

"And I for one," answered Agricola, "am quite sure that all affairs conducted with honour and integrity are profitable in the end; but to return to our speculator. 'Now,' says he, 'my workmen are comfortably lodged close to their work, consequently they enter upon their employment each day cheerful, and able to perform their labour; but that is not enough, the English workman, living upon good and solid food, and drinking excellent beer, can in the same space of time perform twice as much work as the French workman † partaking only of a feeble and injurious nourishment, more enfeebling than strengthening, owing to the great adulteration of the articles employed. My work-people would then work better, in proportion as they were better fed; but how can I effect this?—by acting upon the same plan as that adopted in barracks, schools, and in prisons, which is to club together, and so to provide a sum impossible to realise by any single effort, or without such a combination. Now if my 260 workmen, instead of each making a miserable attempt at cookery, would join, and only have one really good and excellent table, what an infinite advantage for them, and for me also. Two or three active, industrious women would be sufficient, with the assistance of children, to prepare the repasts. Then, instead of buying wood and coals in small quantities, and at almost double its price,‡ my workpeople would, with my gua-

* This estimate is correct, though perhaps a little exaggerated. A similar building, about a mile from Paris, near Montrouge, with all the vast dependencies, such as kitchen, washhouse, scullery, &c., reservoir for gas, water, apparatus for heating the rooms, &c., and surrounded by a garden of ten acres, would have cost, at the period of this history, scarcely 500,000 francs; and these details are still further confirmed by the opinion of an experienced builder especially consulted. This, then, is clearly proved, that for the price usually paid by workmen for their small lodgings, the same number of men might be comfortably and healthily accommodated by the owner of the building, who would receive ten per cent for the interest of his money.

† This was abundantly proved during the making of the railroad at Rouen; those French labourers who, having no family, chose to adopt the English mode of living, were able to perform almost double their usual labour when comforted and invigorated by an abundant and nourishing diet.

‡ We have already observed that the price of wood, when purchased in retail, costs nearly twice the sum paid by such as can buy it in large quantities; the same rule holds good with all articles bought in small quantities, both the fractional parts of the weight and price being taken in favour of the seller, rantee for the payment (and I should always have security in their wages), might, by thus clubbing together, lay in large stocks of wood, flour, butter, oil, wine, &c., by purchasing them first-hand; by this means they would get pure and wholesome wine for three or four sous the bottle, instead of paying twelve or fifteen for a weak and adulterated beverage. Every week the Association would provide a live ox, and as many sheep as necessary. The housewives would make the bread after the country fashion, so that, by following out this plan, and observing due order and economy, my men might have for twenty or twenty-five sous a-day a good and abundant living."

"Ah, M. Agricola! Now it is all explained!"

"Oh, but you have not heard all, mademoiselle; our calculating speculator would thus continue the argument: 'So far I have managed to lodge, warm, and feed my work-people at half what they individually could accomplish it. Now, then, let us see what is to be done as to clothing them equally advantageously. In all probability my plan as regards these former arrangements will ensure their perfect health, and health is the workman's stock in trade, the Association I propose to form will then be in a condition to purchase, still under my guarantee for the payment (which their wages secure to me), at wholesale prices, warm and substantial materials, good useful linen, and different species of stuffs, which the wives of the married men can make up into garments as well as a tailor could do. Then, so large a consumption of hats, caps, shoes, boots, &c., being required, the Association might obtain them at a very considerable reduction of price by purchasing them, either by contract, or of the manufacturer at trade prices.' Now, then, Mademoiselle Angèle, what say you to our speculatist?"

"I can only say," replied the person addressed, with most charming simplicity, "that what you tell me is almost beyond belief, and yet so simple that a child can understand it."

"You are right, for nothing is more simple than all well-directed actions, nothing more beautiful, and yet men seem to overlook that. Observe, however, that hitherto our man of business has spoken only with a view to his own particular interest, only looking upon the personal advantages that would accrue to himself, taking no account of the value of fraternity, the solidity, the support to be derived from such an Association, not reflecting that a state of comfort softens and improves the nature and character of man, never recalling to his mind the imperative duty which dictates to the strong to aid and support the weak, forgetting this one great maxim, 'That every honest, industrious, and active man, has a positive right to exact from society both employment and wages proportionate to the wants of his condition.' No, no, the speculatist we have been considering thinks only of the net profit, yet, you see, he has found the way, not only to invest his money to the very best advantage, but also to secure most important advantages to his work-people."

"Yes, indeed, M. Agricola, I see that quite plainly."

"Then what will you say, when I shall have proved to you that our speculator has also a great interest in giving his workmen, in addition to their wages, a certain proportion in the profit he himself derives?"

"Oh, but, M. Agricola, that would be much more difficult for you to explain or me to understand!"

"Then favour me by listening a few minutes, and I am sure you will be convinced it is so."

While thus conversing, Angèle and Agricola had nearly reached the gate of the garden belonging to the Maison Commune.

An elderly woman, dressed very neatly though plainly, approached Agricola and said,—

"Has M. Hardy returned to the manufactory yet, sir?"

"No, madame; but we expect him every minute."

"Do you think he will be here to-day?"

"To-day or to-morrow, madame."

"I suppose, sir, you cannot tell me at what hour to-morrow he is likely to be here?"

"I scarcely believe any one knows that; but the porter belonging to the manufactory, who is also M. Hardy's porter, may very likely be able to tell you."

"Thank you kindly, sir."

"Good day, madame."

"M. Agricola," said Angèle, when the woman whose appearance had broken into their conversation was quite out of sight, "did it not strike you that the poor woman who has just left us was very pale and agitated?"

"I observed it equally with yourself, mademoiselle, and I even fancied I observed her eyes filled with tears."

"She did, indeed, look as though she had been weeping bitterly, poor thing. I dare say, she came to ask some favour of M. Hardy; but what is the matter with you, M. Agricola, you appear quite sad?"

CHAPTER XXXVII.

THE SECRET (continued).

AGRICOLA felt a vague presentiment that the visit of this elderly female, who looked so melancholy, might have some connexion with the adventure of the young and pretty fair lady who, three days before, had come so disconsolate and wretched to make inquiries as to M. Hardy, and who had learned too late, perhaps, that she was watched and followed.

"Pardon me, mademoiselle," said Agricola to Angèle, "but the coming of this female reminded me of a circumstance of which unfortunately I cannot speak to you as it is not my own secret."

"Oh, never mind, M. Agricola," replied the young girl, with a smile, "I am not inquisitive, and what you were telling me interests me so much that I have no wish to hear you speak of any thing else."

"Well, then, mademoiselle, a few more words, and you will be as fully initiated into all the secrets of our Association as I am myself."

"I listen with pleasure, M. Agricola."

"Let us suppose, then, that some calculating speculator was talking, he would say, 'Here are my workmen in the best possible condition for working well, what is the next best step to take to obtain the largest profits? To make cheap—to sell dear. But there is no cheapness unless the raw material be purchased economically, unless the work itself be done in the best manner, and unless that work be done quickly. But, in spite of my watchfulness, how can I prevent my workmen from wasting the raw material? How can I engage them, each in his particular department, to find out and use the most simple and least expensive method?' "

"True, M. Agricola, how is that to be done?"

"And that is not all; our man will say, 'In order to sell my produce very well they must be of the best—irreproachable. My workpeople do pretty well—that is not sufficient—they must produce masterpieces.' "

"But, M. Agricola, when their task is sufficiently well done, what interest have the workmen to over-exert themselves in order to produce masterpieces?"

"That is the very phrase, Mademoiselle Angèle, WHAT INTEREST have they? Our speculator also says, 'My workmen must have an interest in economising the raw material,—interest in employing their time fully,—interest in discovering the best modes of production,—interest, that what they produce shall be masterpieces. Then my aim is achieved. Well, let me interest my workmen in the profits which I derive from their economy, activity, zeal, and skill. The better they work, the better I shall sell; the better their share, the better also mine.' "

"Oh, now I understand, M. Agricola."

"And our speculator would speculate well. Before he was interested, the workman would say, 'Oh, it's of no consequence to me that I do more in the day or am better at the work; what do I gain by it? Nothing! Well, then, for a limited salary, limited duty. Now, on the contrary, I have an interest in exhibiting zeal and economy, and therefore the whole thing is changed. I redouble my activity, I stimulate that of others. If a comrade is idle and causes any injury to the factory, why, I have a right to say to him, 'Brother, we are suffering more or less by your laziness or from the harm you are doing to our common interest.' "

"And, then, with what ardour, courage, and hope, the work would be done, M. Agricola?"

"It is on that that our speculator has calculated, and he will say then, 'Treasures of experience and practical knowledge are often hidden in workshops for want of a good will, opportunity, or encouragement; excellent workmen, instead of putting out their skill, and making improvements as they can do so well, follow the old routine with indifference. How lamentable! for an intelligent man engaged all his life in some peculiar occupation must discover in progress of time a thousand modes of working better or faster. I will found, then, a sort of consulting committee to which I will nominate my principal overlookers and my best workmen; our interest is now common; and from this combination of practical intelligence much useful and new information must arise.' The speculator is not deceived, and soon struck by the incredible resources, the thousand and one new, ingenious, and perfect ideas, suddenly elicited by the workmen, 'You good-for-nothing fellows,' he exclaims, 'you knew all this and never told me! What has cost me these ten years a hundred francs to make has now only cost fifty francs besides an enormous saving of time.' 'Master,' replies a workman, who is as shrewd as his neighbour, 'what interest had I whether you saved fifty per cent on an article or not? None! Now it is a different affair. You give me, besides my wages, a share in your profits; you elevate me in my own eyes by consulting my experience, my knowledge; instead of treating me as an inferior being, you take me into council; and now it is my interest, it is my duty, to tell you all I know, and to endeavour to learn more.' So you see, Mademoiselle Angèle, how the speculator would organise his workshops, so as to make his rivals ashamed of themselves, and envious of him. Now, if instead of this mere calculating speculator, we have a man who, joining to a knowledge of figures the tender and generous feelings of a noble heart and great elevation of mind,—one who would expend his anxious care, not only on the actual well-doing, but the moral enlightenment of his workmen, seeking by every possible means to develop their understanding, elevate their hearts, and, strong in the authority with which his benevolence invests him, feeling deeply that he on whom depends the good or evil of three hundred human creatures should also look after their souls, should guide those whom he no longer calls his work-people, but his brothers, in the most straight and noble paths,—should endeavour to excite in them a taste for learning, for all the arts which would render them happy and proud of a position which is but too often assumed by others with the tears of bitterness and of despair;—then, then, Mademoiselle Angèle, this man is—— But, what do I see? he could not arrive more opportunely amongst us than whilst we were pronouncing a benediction—Here he is!—it is M. Hardy!"

"Ah, Monsieur Agricola," said Angèle, drying her tears, "it is with hands clasped in gratitude that we ought to receive him."

"Look! see if that noble and benevolent face is not the image of his admirable heart!"

At this instant a travelling chariot, in which were M. Hardy and M. de Blessac, the unworthy friend who deceived him so infamously, entered the court-yard of the factory.

And now a few words in reference to the facts which we have endeavoured to narrate dramatically, and which are connected with the organisation of labour,—a question of paramount importance; and which will again occupy our attention before the end of this book.

In spite of the speeches, more or less official, of persons more or less SERIOUS (it seems to us as though this weighty epithet were somewhat abused), as to the INCREASING PROSPERITY OF THE COUNTRY, there is one fact beyond all dispute:—

It is, that the working classes of society have never been more miserable; for wages have never been less adequate to the wants of those classes however moderate.

An indisputable proof of what we assert is found in the tendency, —and we cannot too highly praise that tendency—which the rich classes are progressively making in order to aid and succour those who are suffering so much distress.

Charitable institutions, houses of refuge for poor children, philanthropic establishments, &c. &c., prove sufficiently that the happy in this world foresee, that in spite of official assurances as to the state of general prosperity, terrible and threatening evils are fermenting in the depths of society.

How generous soever may be these isolated and individual attempts, they are and must be more than insufficient.

The persons in power can alone take the initiative effectually ; but they carefully avoid it.

The serious people discuss seriously the importance of our diplomatic relations with Monomotapa, or some other matter equally serious ; and they abandon to the chances of private commiseration, to the uncertainties of the good or bad inclination of capitalists and manufacturers, the fate more and more wretched of an immense, intelligent, and hard-working population, becoming hourly more and more enlightened as to their rights and their strength ; and so depressed by the evils of a reckless rivalry, that they are often in want of the work which affords them at best but the scantiest means of existence !

Agreed, that the serious persons do not deign to think of these formidable miseries.

Statesmen smile with pity at the mere idea of attaching their names to an initiative, which would surround them with an overwhelming and delightful popularity.

Agreed, that all prefer to await the moment when the social question will burst like a clap of thunder. Then, in the midst of this fearful commotion, which will shake the world, we shall see what will become of the serious questions and the serious men of our times.

To lay, or at least to drive back this awful future, we must then address ourselves to private sympathies in the name of happiness, of tranquillity, and the general safety.

We have said long since, IF THE RICH BUT KNEW ! Well ! we repeat, to the honour of humanity, when the rich do know, they do good with intelligence and generosity.

Let us endeavour to prove to them, and to those, also, on whom depends the fate of an innumerable body of workmen, that they may be blessed and adored, without, indeed, loosening their purse-strings.

We have spoken of the Maison Commune in which the workmen are lodged at such low rents, in salubrious and well-aired apartments.

This excellent institution was on the point of being realised in 1829, through the charitable intentions of Mademoiselle Amélie de Vitrolles.* At this time in England, Lord Ashley is at the head of a company, which has similar intentions ; and offers to the shareholders a minimum of interest at 4l. per cent.

Why should not France follow such an example ?—an example which would have beside the advantage of giving to the poorer classes the first rudiments, and the first means of association ?

The immense advantages of living in common are manifest ; they strike all minds ; but the people themselves are not enabled to found establishments indispensable to these committees. What immense services, then, the rich would render, by placing the working classes in a condition to enjoy these precious advantages ! What consequence would it be to them to have built a house which would contain fifty sets of salubrious apartments, capable of containing families, provided the interest of their money was assured ? and it would be very easy to guarantee that.

* See the "Démocratie Pacifique," of the 19th October, 1844.

Why does not the "Institut," which gives annually, as subjects of competition to young artists, plans of palaces, churches, theatres, &c. &c., require the plan of a large establishment intended for the lodging of the working classes, who might there unite all the best advantages of economy and salubrity ?

Why does not the Municipal Council of Paris, whose excellent intention and paternal anxiety for the suffering classes have been so often and so fully manifested, establish in the populous arrondissements models of Maisons Communes, where they would try the first specimens of a life in common ? The desire of being admitted into these establishments would be a powerful lever of emulation, morals, and also a comfort and hope for working people,—and hope is something.

The city of Paris would thus make a good investment, do a good action, and, perhaps, by its example, the ruling powers might be induced to throw off their pitiless indifference.

Why, in fine, do not the capitalists who establish manufactories profit by that opportunity of uniting the Maisons Communes of the workmen to their mills or factories ?

A very considerable advantage would accrue to the employers themselves in these times of desperate rivalry. In this way, the reduction of salary is the more afflicting and unendurable for the workman, as he is deprived thereby of things of the first necessity ; but if living alone, three francs are scarcely sufficient for his support, and the employer offers him the means of living with half that sum, thanks to this Association, the artisan's wages might at the time of a commercial crisis be reduced one-half without his feeling this diminution so severely ; and it would be so much the better than an entire stoppage of work and consequent cessation of wages.

We trust we have proved the advantage, utility, and facility of establishing Maisons Communes for workmen.

We have, then, established this :—

That it would be not only of the strictest justice that the workmen should participate in profits resulting from his labour and his intelligence, but that this just division would profit the master manufacturer himself.

We are not now putting forth hypotheses of projects easy to be realised, but are stating facts already accomplished.

One of our best friends, a very extensive manufacturer, whose heart is equal to his head, has established a consulting committee of work-people, and has allowed them (besides their wages) to enjoy a proportional share in the profits of his undertaking, and already have the results surpassed all hopes. In order to give to this excellent example every possible facility of execution, should any minds, at once sagacious and generous, desire to imitate him, we add at the end of this chapter the first regulations of this organisation.

We would only remark that the very primary rules of the establishment and other considerations have not at first allowed of all the work-people employed availing themselves of the profits so freely awarded to them, and which some day they will all enjoy.

We can affirm that, from the fourth meeting of this consulting committee, the worthy manufacturer, to whom we refer, had obtained such results from the appeal he made to the practical information of the workmen, that he was enabled to calculate at *once at thirty thousand francs (1200*l.) a-year the profits which would result from the saving and improvement in the manufacture.

To sum up:—

There is in every trade or calling three powers, three agents, three movers, whose rights should be equally respected.

The capitalist, who supplies the money;

The intelligent individual, who directs the working;

The workman, who produces the work.

Up to this time the workman has had but a very small portion, wholly inadequate to his wants. Would it not, therefore, be just—humane, to pay him better, and that directly or indirectly, either by facilitating the comfort which the Association offers, or by giving him a portion of the profit due to his labours?

Admitting, even at the worst, and after taking into consideration the ruinous effects of deadly rivalry, that this increase of salary would diminish, in some small degree, the profits of the employer and the director; would they not do, not only a generous and equitable thing, but even a profitable one, by placing their fortune and business out of the reach of all harm and injury, since they would have deprived the work-people of every legitimate excuse for disturbance, or of severe well-founded recriminations?

In a word, those persons appear to us always wise and prudent who insure their property against fire.

* * * * *

We have said that M. Hardy and M. de Blessac had arrived at the factory.

Shortly afterwards, from the Paris side, was seen advancing a humble hackney-coach, which drove towards the factory.

In this vehicle was Rodin.

The following are the main rules we have above referred to.

The regulation which treats of the functions of the committee is preceded by the following considerations as honourable for the master as the men:—

“We are delighted to acknowledge that each supervisor, each overseer, and each workman, contributes in his particular sphere of his labour to those qualities which are most conspicuous in the produce of our manufactures. They ought, therefore, to share in the profits they occasion, and continue to devote themselves to the progress which is still to be made. It is evident that a great benefit would result from the combination of the information and ideas of each. We have therefore formed the committee, whose comparative duties will be hereafter regulated.

"We have had, for our object, in forming this institution, the increase by frequent exchange of ideas amongst the workmen, who, until now, have lived and worked almost entirely isolated the total of each one's knowledge, and to initiate them in the general principles of a wholesome and right administration. From this combination of the best strength of the workshop around the head of the establishment will arise the double profit of the intellectual and bodily amelioration of the workmen, and the increase of the prosperity of the manufacture.

"Admitting, moreover, as just, that the exertion of each should be recompensed, we have resolved that, on the net profits of the house, all expenses and outgoings deducted, there shall be then deducted five per cent, which shall be divided in equal portions amongst the members of the committee (with the exception of the president, vice-president, and secretary), which shall be handed to them every year, on the 31st of December.

"This premium shall be increased one per cent every time that the committee shall admit three fresh members.

"Morality, good conduct, skill, and various aptitudes for labour, have determined our choice in selecting those workmen of whom we first form our committee. Granting these members the power of proposing the addition of fresh members, whose admission will be based on the same qualifications, and who will be elected by the committee itself, we would present to all the workmen of our workshops an aim, which it will depend on themselves to attain, sooner or later.

"Their endeavours to fulfil all their duties by completing their work in the most perfect manner, and their behaviour out of working-hours will, in turns, open to them the door of the committee. They will also be entitled to enjoy a just and fair proportion in the advantages resulting from the success which our manufactures may obtain,—a success to which they will have contributed, and which cannot but increase through the good understanding and the fruitful rivalry which (we question not) will reign amongst the members of the committee."

Extract from the arrangements relative to the consulting committee, consisting of a president (supervisor of the establishment), a vice-president, a secretary, and fourteen members; four of whom are overseers, and ten workmen, of the most intelligent, in the various departments.

"Article 6. These members, when met, shall have the right to propose the addition of a new member, whose name shall be inscribed, in order that his admission be discussed at the following meeting. This admission shall be decided when, after ballot, the member proposed shall obtain two-thirds of the suffrages of the members assembled.

"Article 7. The committee shall, at its monthly sittings, occupy itself:—

"1st. In finding the means to remedy the inconveniences which each day present themselves in manufacturing:

"2d. In proposing better and more economical means of establishing a fabric of goods, especially intended for exportation, and thus effectually, by the superiority of our make, to defeat foreign competition :

"3d. The means of arriving at the greatest degree of economy in the use of materials, without injuring the strength and quality of the goods manufactured :

"4th. To propose and discuss propositions which shall be brought forward by the president, or other of the committee, looking especially to the improvements and perfection of the manufactures :

"5th. Finally, to place the price of the production in right equality with the real value of the goods produced."

We add, on our own part, that, according to the information which M. — has kindly given us, the share of profit of each of his workmen (besides his regular wages) will be, at least, from three hundred to three hundred and fifty francs a-year. We regret most poignantly that the modest feelings of M. — do not allow us to reveal in these pages the name, as honourable as honoured, of the worthy individual who has set this admirable example.

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

DISCLOSURES.

DURING the visit of Angèle and Agricola to the Maison Commune, the band of Loups, increasing in numbers as they advanced, by the addition of many idlers from the public-houses, had continued its progress towards the factory, whither also the hackney-coach which had brought Rodin from Paris was slowly advancing.

M. Hardy, descending from the carriage with his friend M. de Blessac, had entered the drawing-room of the house which he occupied close to the manufactory.

M. Hardy was of middle stature, elegantly and slightly made, and his appearance betokened a temperament essentially nervous and easily excited. His brow was high and expansive, his complexion pale, his eyes black, and equally expressive and penetrating, his physiognomy frank, intelligent, and attractive.

One word will paint the character of M. Hardy. His mother called him "the Sensitive Plant;" and, indeed, his was one of those exquisitely fine and delicate organisations, as expansive and affectionate as they were noble and generous, and so highly susceptible that, at the least harsh contact, they shrunk back and concentrated themselves in his breast.

When, united to this excessive sensibility, there existed a passionate love for the arts, a highly refined understanding, tastes essentially pure and unalloyed, we may imagine the thousand deceptions and frauds of which M. Hardy must have been the victim in his mercantile career, and inquire how a heart so delicate and so tender, had not been broken to pieces a thousand times in the incessant struggle against the most reckless and pitiless rivalries.

M. Hardy had, indeed, suffered severely. Compelled to follow a mercantile career, in order to continue honourably the affairs of his father, a model of rectitude and probity, whose affairs had been left somewhat in embarrassment owing to the events of 1815, he had acquired by his exertions and abilities one of the most highly honoured names in the mercantile world: but in order to achieve this end, what low cunning had he not to contend against, what perfidious rivalries to experience, what treacherous competition to encounter!

Excitable as he was, M. Hardy must have sunk a thousand times in his frequent experiences of painful indignation at baseness, of bitter disgust at dishonesty, but for the wise and firm support of his mother. On his return to her, after a day of painful struggle or hateful deception, he suddenly found himself transported into an atmosphere of purity so gracious, of serenity so entire, that he immediately lost the recollection of the tormenting things which had so deeply disgusted him during the day. The wounds of his mind were closed when he came into contact with the great and noble soul of his mother, and thus his love for her was little less than idolatry. When he lost her, he experienced one of those silent but deep shocks, like the griefs which never cease, and which forming, as we may say, a part and parcel of our existence, have yet occasionally their days of melancholy sweetness.

A short time after this deep affliction, M. Hardy connected himself more closely with his workmen. He had always been just and kind to them, but although the void which his mother left in his heart must be ever unfilled, he felt a redoubled regard rise within him; experiencing the greater need to see around him happy faces in proportion as he suffered; and then very soon the wonderful ameliorations which he applied for the physical and moral improvement of all around him served, not only as a relief, but as an occupation to his sorrow. Thus he gradually withdrew himself from the world, and concentrated his existence in three affections,—a tender and devoted friendship, which seemed to complete all his past friendships; a love as sincere and ardent as a last love; and a paternal attachment for his workpeople.

His days passed, therefore, in the midst of the little world which he had filled with gratitude and respect for himself; a world which he had formed after his own views, in order to find therein a refuge from the painful realities which he so abhorred, and which comprised only good, intelligent, and happy beings, capable of responding to all the noble thoughts which had now become to him of greater and greater necessity.

Thus, after many sorrows, M. Hardy, arrived at the prime of life, possessing a sincere friend, a mistress worthy of his love, and knowing that he was assured of the deepest attachment of his workpeople, had attained, at the moment of this recital, the utmost sum of felicity for which he could hope since his mother's decease.

* * * * *

M. de Blessac, the bosom friend of M. Hardy, had for a long time been worthy of his close and fraternal friendship and affection, but we have seen by what diabolical means the Père d'Aigrigny and Rodin had contrived to convert M. de Blessac (until then upright and sincere) into the tool of their dark machinations.

The two friends, who had suffered a little during their journey from the keenness of the north wind, were warming themselves before a good fire burning in the salon of M. Hardy.

"Oh! my dear Marcel, I am decidedly growing old," said M. Hardy, with a smile, as he addressed M. de Blessac, "and I feel more than ever the want of home. To leave my usual occupations, becomes decidedly painful, and I feel ill-disposed to every body and every thing that compels me to quit this happy corner of the earth."

"And when I remember," replied M. de Blessac, unable to keep down the slight colour that came to his cheek,—“when I remember, my friend, that it was for me that you undertook some time ago such a long journey!”

"Well, my dear Marcel, did you not in your turn come to accompany me in an excursion, which, without you, would have been as tiresome as it has been charming?"

"But, my dear friend, what a difference! I have contracted towards you a debt which I can never properly pay."

"Come, come, my dear Marcel, is there between us two any distinction of mine and thine? As regards feelings of attachment, is it not as delightful, as good to give as to receive?"

"Noble heart!—noble heart!"

"Say happy heart. Oh, yes! happy in that affection for which its latest pulses must beat."

"And who should deserve happiness in this world, my dear friend, if it be not you?"

"To whom do I owe this happiness? To the affections which I have found here ready to sustain me, when, deprived of the support of my mother, who was my whole strength, I felt myself (I am ready to avow the weakness) almost incapable of supporting adversity."

"You, my friend, so firm, so determined in character, so resolute in doing good. You, whom I have seen struggling with as much energy as courage to carry out triumphantly an honest and just scheme?"

"True, but the more I advance in my career, the more do repulsive and disgusting things come before me, and call up my aversion, and the less do I feel my power of facing them?"

"You would have courage enough, my dear friend, if any occasion presented itself."

"My dear Marcel," replied M. Hardy, with gentle and repressed emotion, "I have often told you my mother was my courage. When, my friend, I was with her, my heart torn by some black ingratitude, or revolted at some sordid cheatery, taking my two hands between her two venerable hands, she said to me, in sweet and serious voice, 'My dear child, it is rogues and villains who ought to be distressed; let us pity the wicked, let us punish the wickedness, but let us think only of the good.' Why then, my friend, my heart, painfully smitten, expanded beneath the holy influence of this maternal advice, and every day I found in her presence the necessary strength to begin the next day that fierce struggle against the sad necessities of my condition. Fortunately God has willed it, that, after having lost this beloved mother, I have been able to attach to my existence those affections, without which, I confess, I should feel myself weak and unprotected, for you can scarcely believe, Marcel, the support, the strength I find in your friendship."

"Speak no more of me, my friend," continued De Blessac, hiding his own embarrassment. "Let us talk of another affection, almost as gentle and as tender as that of a mother."

"I understand you, my good Marcel," replied M. Hardy. "I have concealed nothing from you; because, in a most serious matter I have had recourse to the counsels of your friendship! Yes, I think that every day of my life my adoration for that dear woman increases; she is the only one I have ever passionately loved, the only one whom now I shall ever love; and then, too, if I must tell all, my mother, ignorant of how dear Marguerite was to me, so often praised her, that her eulogy renders that love almost sacred in my eyes."

"And then, there are such strange coincidences between the character of Madame de Noisy and your own, my friend,—her idolatry for her mother particularly!"

"True, Marcel; and this characteristic of Marguerite has often been to me a source of equal admiration and torment. How often has she said to me with her usual frankness, 'I have sacrificed all for you; but I would sacrifice you for my mother.'"

"Dieu Merci! my friend, you can never fear that you will see Madame de Noisy exposed to that cruel struggle. Her mother has long since given up the idea, as you tell me, of returning to America, where M. de Noisy, who is perfectly careless about his wife, appears fixed for ever. Thanks to the discretion and devotion of the worthy woman who brought Marguerite up. Your love is buried in the deepest mystery. What is there that could now trouble it?"

"Nothing! oh, nothing!" exclaimed M. Hardy. "I have even all but guarantees for its duration."

"What do you mean, my friend?"

"I do not know that I ought to tell even you."

"Am I indiscreet, my friend?"

"You, my dear Marcel? I never fancied so for a moment," said M. Hardy, in a friendly, but reproachful tone; "no; but I do not like to tell you of my happiness until it is complete; and there is still wanting something to complete the certainty of a particular project."

A servant entered at this moment, who said to M. Hardy,—

"Sir, there is an old gentleman who desires to see you on very pressing business."

"Already!" said M. Hardy, with slight impatience. "Will you allow me, my friend?"

M. de Blessac rose to withdraw into another room; but M. Hardy stopped him, smiling and saying, "No, no, remain. Your presence will hasten the interview."

"But if it be on business, my friend?"

"I transact that always openly, as you are aware." Then, turning to the servant,—

"Desire the gentleman to come in."

"The postilion wishes to know if he may go?" said the servant.

"Certainly not. He will have to take M. de Blessac to Paris; so let him wait."

The servant left the room; and returned immediately with Rodin, whom De Blessac did not know, as his own treachery had been arranged by another agent.

"M. Hardy?" said Rodin, bowing respectfully, and looking first at one, and then at the other of the two friends.

"I am he, sir, at your service," replied the manufacturer, in a bland tone; for, at the sight of this old, humble, and meanly clad person, he thought he had come to ask for assistance.

"You, sir, François Hardy?" repeated Rodin, as if he wished to make quite sure of the identity of the person.

"I have already had the honour to inform you, sir, that I am he."

"I have a private communication to make to you, sir," said Rodin.

"You may speak out, sir; this gentleman is my friend," said M. Hardy, looking towards M. de Blessac.

"But it is to you, only, that I wish to speak, sir," replied Rodin.

M. de Blessac was about to retire, when M. Hardy retained him by a glance, saying kindly to Rodin, fearing that the presence of a third person might annoy him if he was about to ask for alms,—

"Sir, allow me to ask if it is for you or myself that you require a secret interview?"

"For you, sir,—for you, and you only," replied Rodin.

"Then, sir," replied M. Hardy, in extreme astonishment, "you may speak out. I have no secrets from this gentleman."

After a momentary silence Rodin, addressing himself to M. Hardy, resumed the subject, saying,—

"For you, sir, who I know to be deserving of the universal esteem in which you are justly held, you have a claim upon the sympathy of every honest heart."

"I am glad you think so, sir."

"I do; and to prove my sincerity, I come as an honest, straightforward man, to render you a service."

"And may I inquire the nature of this service, sir?"

"It is to expose a vile and disgraceful deception practised on you, and by which you have been treacherously betrayed."

"You must be mistaken, sir!"

"Not at all. I have undeniable proofs of what I advance."

"Let me have these proofs."

"I tell you, sir, I have written evidence of the perfidy I come to unmask; in a word, you have been most basely deceived by a man you called your dearest friend!"

"And his name?"

"M. Marcel de Blessac!" replied Rodin.

The person thus alluded to started at these words as though a thunderbolt had fallen at his feet. A livid paleness overspread his features, and with difficulty he managed to stammer out, "Sir!"

Without even looking at his friend, or perceiving his excessive agitation and alarm, M. Hardy caught him by the hand, exclaiming in a tone of affectionate warmth,—

RODIN EXPOSING M. DE ELESSAC.

"Silence! my dear friend!" Then, with indignation sparkling in his eyes, he cried to Rodin, whom he continued to gaze on with supreme contempt,—

"So! then it is M. de Blessac whom you accuse?"

"It is!" answered Rodin, firmly.

"Do you know him?"

"I never saw him in my life!"

"Then how dare you presume to utter his name? And of what is it you dare to accuse him—of betraying my friendship?"

"Two words, if you please, sir," said Rodin, with an agitation he appeared vainly striving to repress. "Supposing that one honourable man saw another equally honourable about to be murdered by a villain, would he be doing right or wrong in calling out for assistance, and giving the scoundrel into custody?"

"Of course he would, sir; but what connexion can this case possibly have with ——"

"In my opinion, sir, there are certain acts of treachery every bit as criminal as murder itself; and with those sentiments I am here to interpose between the executioner and his victim."

"Executioner! Victim!" exclaimed M. Hardy, more and more bewildered and surprised. "What words are these?"

"I presume you are well acquainted with the handwriting of M. de Blessac," said Rodin.

"I am, sir."

"Then, read this," said Rodin, taking from his pocket a letter, which he presented to M. Hardy, who for the first time, casting his eyes towards his friend, was petrified at beholding the mortal paleness of his countenance; in truth, M. de Blessac possessed not the daring effrontery requisite for such as engage in treacherous proceedings, and felt all the speechless agony of one who felt that the hour of exposure was at hand.

"Marcel!" exclaimed M. Hardy, in great alarm and perturbation, at this unexpected sight. "Marcel! for heaven's sake, what means your silence—your paleness?"

"Marcel!" exclaimed Rodin, feigning the most painful astonishment. "Is it possible this gentleman can be M. de Blessac? Oh, if I had but known that!"

"Do you not hear what this man says, Marcel?" cried M. Hardy, seizing the hand of M. de Blessac; "he asserts that you have shamefully deceived and wronged me!"

But the hand he grasped was cold and clammy as that of a corpse.

"God of Heaven!" continued M. Hardy, shrinking back with a horrible dread of he scarcely knew what; "he speaks not—he attempts not to reply!"

"Since I find myself in the presence of M. de Blessac," said Rodin, "I find myself obliged to ask him if he can venture to deny having addressed several letters to the Rue Milieu des Ursins in Paris, under cover to M. Rodin."

M. de Blessac still preserved silence.

Unwilling to credit either his eyes or his ears, M. Hardy convulsively tore open the letter given him by Rodin, and hastily perused a few lines, occasionally breaking out into exclamations abundantly expressive of the deep anguish he endured. He had no need to complete the reading of the whole epistle, to receive the most perfect conviction of the black treachery of M. de Blessac. Overpowered by the incontrovertible evidence of the letter, and staggering beneath the dreadful certainty it afforded of the infamous deception and perfidious conduct practised towards him by one he had so loved and trusted, the brain of M. Hardy seemed almost to give way under so fearful a blow. His senses seemed forsaking him, and his very blood seemed curdling round his heart as he glanced at the abyss of shame and misery dug by the friend he would have defended with his life. The dreadful letter fell from his trembling hands; but to this first shock succeeded a paroxysm of rage, indignation, and contempt, and seizing M. de Blessac with one hand, he exclaimed, while raising the other in a threatening attitude, "Villain!" Then suddenly arresting the intended blow, he said, with terrifying calmness, "No! I should disgrace my hand were I to allow it to touch you!" then added, turning towards Rodin, who was hastily advancing to interpose, "'Tis not in buffeting the cheek of a cowardly traitor I should employ myself, but in warmly and cordially grasping yours, my good sir, who have had the courage to unmask a traitor and a coward!"

"Sir!" cried M. de Blessac, sinking with shame, "I am at your disposal—I wait your commands—and——"

He stopped, utterly unable to utter another syllable. A noise of persons speaking resounded from without the door, which opened violently, and an aged female rushed in spite of all the efforts made by a servant to prevent her, saying, in an agitated tone, "I tell you I must speak to your master this very minute!" At the sound of the voice and the appearance of the pale, trembling, and distressed woman who stood before him, M. Hardy forgot alike M. de Blessac, Rodin, and the treachery practised upon himself. Starting with alarm and surprise, he exclaimed,—

"Madame Dupau, what has occurred? What brings you here?"

"Alas, monsieur, a great—a heavy misfortune!"

"Marguerite?" exclaimed M. Hardy, in heart-rending tones.

"She has gone, sir."

"Gone!" repeated M. Hardy, as struck with terror as though the ground had opened beneath his feet.

"Marguerite gone?" cried he.

"All is discovered, and three days ago she was taken away by her mother," said the unhappy woman, in faltering tones.

"Gone! Marguerite gone!" persisted M. Hardy. "Oh, it is not—it cannot be true! You are deceiving me!" And without waiting for one word of explanation, he rushed, bewildered and distracted, out of the house, hastened to the court-yard, where his carriage, to which post-horses had been attached, was waiting for M. de Blessac, and springing up into it, said to the postilion, "To Paris with all the speed you can!"

* * * * *

At the moment when the vehicle was proceeding with the rapidity of lightning along the road to Paris, the strong wind which prevailed brought the distant noise made by the Loups, as they loudly chanted forth their war-song, while hurrying onwards to attack the manufactory.

CHAPTER XXXIX.

THE ATTACK.

WHEN M. Hardy had left the factory, Rodin, who had not anticipated this abrupt departure, was going slowly towards his coach, when suddenly he paused for a moment, starting with joy and surprise at seeing at some distance from him the Marshal Simon and his father going towards one of the wings of the Maison Commune, for a circumstance had delayed, until this moment, the conversation of the father and son.

"Good!" said Rodin; "very good — better and better; and now if my man has but found out and decided the little Rose Pompon!"

At this instant, the wind, which was rising, brought to the Jesuit's ear the nearer sound of the war-song of the Loups.

After having listened a moment very attentively to this distant noise, with his foot on the step of the caraiage, Rodin said, as he seated himself in the vehicle,—

"The worthy Joshua Van Dael of Java little thinks, at this moment, that his bills on the Baron Tripcaud are in a fair way to become valuable."

And then the hackney-coach went towards the barrier.

* * * * *

Several workmen who were on the point of starting for Paris to convey the reply of their comrades to certain propositions relative to secret societies, had been under the necessity of having a private conversation with the father of Marshal Simon, and hence the delay in his conversation with his son.

The old workman, the foreman of the factory, occupied two very nice rooms on the ground-floor, at the extremity of one of the wings of the Maison Commune; a small garden of about sixty feet square, which he amused himself by cultivating, was close under his windows. The glass-door which led to this flower-bed was open, and allowed the sunbeams, which were warm for the month of March, to penetrate the simple apartment, into which the artisan in his blouse, and the Marshal of France in his full uniform, now entered. Then the Marshal, taking his father's hands in his own, said to him in a voice so sad, that the old man started at it,—

"Father, I am very unhappy;" and a painful expression, until then repressed, suddenly darkened the noble features of the Marshal.

"You, unhappy?" exclaimed the elder Simon, with uneasiness, and going close towards him.

"I will tell you all, my father," replied the Marshal, in a tremulous voice; "for I require the counsel of your inflexible integrity."

"With respect to honour and loyalty, you have no occasion to ask counsel of any one."

"Yes, my father, you only can draw me from an uncertainty which is most agonising torture to me."

"Explain yourself, and quickly, I entreat."

"For some days, my daughters have appeared under some constraint — dejected. During the first moments of our meeting, they were wild with joy and happiness; all at once that has changed, and they are, each day, more and more sad. Yesterday I surprised a tear in their eyes, and when filled with emotion, I clasped them to my heart, entreating them to tell me their grief. They made no reply, but threw their arms round my neck and bedewed my cheeks with tears."

"That is very strange. To what can you attribute this change?"

"Sometimes I fear that I have not sufficiently concealed from them my sorrow at their mother's death; and the dear angels, perhaps, mourn because they see themselves insufficient for my happiness. Yet, strange to say, they seem not only to understand, but to share my sorrow. Yesterday, Blanche said to me, 'How happy we should all be again if our mother was with us!'"

"They share your grief and do not reproach you for it. The cause of their melancholy has another source."

"So I say, father, but what can it be? My imagination is exhausted in trying to find it out. What shall I say? Sometimes I go so far as to imagine that some fell demon has glided in between me and my children. The idea is stupid, absurd, I know; but when sound reason is at fault, we sometimes give ourselves up to the wildest suppositions."

"Who could desire to come between you and your children?"

"No one — that I know well enough."

"Come, come, Pierre," said the old workman, paternally; "wait — have patience — watch and scrutinise these poor young hearts with that solicitude which you feel, and I will answer for it you will discover some secret, no doubt, very innocent."

"Yes," said the Marshal, looking steadfastly at his father; "yes, but to penetrate this secret, I ought never to quit them."

"Why do you quit them?" inquired the old man, surprised at the mournful air of his son. "Are you not now to be always with them — with me?"

"Who knows?" replied the Marshal, with a sigh.

"What do you mean?"

"Why, in the first place, father, you know all the duties that keep me here. You know, too, those which may remove me from you, from my daughters, and my other child."

"What child?"

"The son of my old friend, the Indian prince."

"Djalma? Has any thing happened to him?"

"Father, he alarms me."

"He?"

At this moment a loud noise, brought up by a violent gust of wind, was heard in the distance; the uproar was so great, that the Marshal paused a moment, then added,—

"What can that be?"

After having for an instant listened to the deadened sounds which became weaker and passed away with the wind, the old man said,—

"Some noisy, tipsy singers from the Barriers, who are roving about."

"The sounds appeared to come from a large body of persons," replied the Marshal.

He and his father again listened, but the noise had ceased.

"You were saying," resumed the old workman, "that this young Indian alarmed you. In what way?"

"I have told you, father, of his mad and unhappy passion for Mademoiselle de Cardoville."

"And does that frighten you, my son?" asked the old man, looking at him with surprise. "Djalma is only eighteen years of age, and at his time of life one passion drives out the other."

"If it were a mere commonplace love, father, you would say truly; but reflect, to the most dazzling beauty, Mademoiselle de Cardoville, as you know, unites the most noble, most generous disposition; and by a series of fatal circumstances — oh! yes, most fatal — Djalma has had an opportunity of appreciating the rare value of this elevated soul."

"You are right; and this is more serious than I thought it was."

"You have no idea of the ravages which this passion has made on this ardent and untameable child. Sometimes to his painful depression there succeeds the excitement of the most savage ferocity. Yesterday I surprised him suddenly, with bloodshot eye, his features spasmodic with rage, and giving way to the gusts of a wild frenzy, he was stabbing, with his poniard, a red cloth cushion, exclaiming, in a breathless voice, 'Oh, blood — I have his blood!' 'In Heaven's name!' I exclaimed, 'what means this madness?' 'I am killing the man,' he replied, in a gloomy voice and with a wild air. He meant some rival whom he thought he had."

"There is really something terrible in such a passion, in such a heart," said the old man.

"At other times," continued the Marshal, "he directs his rage against Mademoiselle de Cardoville — and then at others, against himself. I have been obliged to remove all his arms, for a man who came from Java with him, and who appears much attached to him, told me that he suspected that he had some thoughts of suicide."

"Unhappy boy!"

"Well, my father," said Maréchal Simon, with deep bitterness, "it is at the moment when my daughters and this child of my adoption demand all my care, that I am, perhaps, on the eve of forsaking them."

"Forsaking them?"

"Yes, to satisfy a duty which is even more sacred than those imposed on us by friendship or ties of blood," said the Marshal, with an accent so grave and solemn, that his father, full of emotion, exclaimed,—

"What duty is it?"

"Father," said the Marshal, after remaining pensive for a moment, "Who made me what I am? Who gave me the title of duke, the bâton of marshal?"

"Napoleon!"

"For you, a stern republican, I know he lost all his prestige, when from the first citizen of a republic, he became emperor."

"I lamented the weakness," sighed old Simon, "that converted a demigod into a man."

"But for me, father, for me, a soldier, who have fought constantly by his side, under his eyes; for me, whom he raised from the lowest ranks of the army to the highest; for me, whom he overwhelmed with kindness and affection, he was ever more than a hero. He has been a friend; and there was as much gratitude as admiration in my idolatry of him. Exiled, I would have shared his exile; but the favour was refused me! Then, I conspired and drew my sword against those who had despoiled his son of the crown which France had given him."

"And in your position you did rightly. Pierre; for, without sharing your admiration, I understand your gratitude, projects of exile, conspiracy, I have approved of all, as you well know."

"Well! this disinherited son, in whose name I have conspired, is seventeen years of age, and now able to wield his father's sword."

"Napoleon II.!" exclaimed the old man, looking at his son with extreme surprise and anxiety. "The King of Rome!"

"King! no, he is no longer King Napoleon,—no, he is no longer called Napoleon, they have given him some Austrian name; for they were afraid of his other name—every thing makes them afraid; and so, do you know what they are doing with the emperor's son?" inquired the Marshal, with painful excitement, "They are torturing him,—killing him by inches!"

"Who told you this?"

"Oh, one who knows, and who has said the truth—the dreadful truth. Yes, the emperor's son is struggling with all his might against a precocious death; his eyes are turned towards France; he waits—waits, and no one goes to him—no one;—not one amongst all the men whom his father has made as great as they were once small; not one—not one thinks of the consecrated child whom they are choking, and who is dying."

"And you—you think ——"

"Yes; but to think of it, it was necessary that I should know. Yes, not to have a doubt on the point: and it was not from the same source that I gathered my information, that I might accurately learn the cruel fate of this boy, to whom I have taken an oath; for one day, as I told you, the emperor, the proud and fond parent, pointing to him in his cradle, said to me, 'My old friend, you will be to the son as you have been to the father! for those who love us love our France also.'"

"Yes, I know it. You have often repeated those words to me; and, like yourself, I have been moved by them."

"Well, father, if learning as I have done, how the son of the emperor suffers, I have seen—seen to a certainty—the most convincing proofs that I am not deceived, if I have seen a letter from a high personage, at the court of Vienna, who offers to a man faithful to the worship of the emperor, the means of entering into communication with the King of Rome, and, perhaps, of rescuing him from his executioners."

"And then," said the artisan, looking steadfastly at his son, "when once Napoleon II. is free?"

"Then!" exclaimed the Marshal, and then dropping his voice, he added, "Why, father, do you think that France is insensible to the humiliation she endures? Do you believe the remembrance of the emperor is worn out? No, no; it is in these days of abasement for our country that his sacred name is silently invoked. What would it be, then, if this glorious name again appeared on the frontier, revived in his son? Do you not believe that the heart of all France would beat for him?"

"This is a conspiracy against the existing government, with Napoleon II. as the war-cry," replied the old man. "It is a serious matter."

"Father, I told you that I was very unhappy; well, am I not?" cried the Marshal. "Not only do I ask myself if I ought to abandon my children and you, to throw myself into all the hazards of so daring an enterprise; but I ask myself, whether I am not pledged to the existing government, which, in recognising my title and my rank, has not favoured me, but only rendered me tardy justice. What ought I to do? To abandon all I love dearest, or remain insensible to the tortures of the son of the emperor,—that emperor to whom I am every thing, to whom, personally, I have sworn fidelity both to himself and his child? Ought I to lose this only occasion of, perhaps, saving him? or ought I not to conspire for him? Tell me if I exaggerate what is due to the memory of the emperor? Speak, my father,—decide. During the whole sleepless night I have endeavoured to single out of this chaos the right line prescribed by honour; and yet I have gone from one indecision to another. You only, my father, I repeat it, you alone can guide me."

After remaining for a few instants lost in reflection, the old man was about to reply to his son, when some person, after having run across the small garden, opened the door on the ground-floor, and entered with great consternation into the room in which Marshal Simon and his father were.

It was Olivier, the young workman, who had escaped from the public-house in the village, where the Loups had assembled.

"M. Simon! M. Simon!" he exclaimed, pale and breathless. "They are here!—they are come!—they are going to attack the factory!"

"Who?" cried the old man, rising quickly.

"The Loups, some quarrymen and stone-masons, and a crowd of idlers and vagabonds, who have joined them on their way. Hark! don't you hear them? They are calling out Death to the Dévorans!"

In fact, the noises grew nigher and nigher.

"It was their noise I heard just now," said the Marshal, also rising from his chair.

"There are more than two hundred, M. Simon," said Olivier. "They are armed with stones and clubs; and, unfortunately, the greater part of the workmen of the factory are in Paris. There are not forty of us left; the women and children have run to their apartments shrieking with affright. Don't you hear them?"

And the ceiling resounded beneath the hasty footsteps.

"Will they really make the attack in earnest?" said the Marshal to his father, who grew more and more uneasy.

"I have no doubt of it," replied the old man. "There is nothing more fierce than these quarrels of companionship; and, moreover, for some time past, every mode has been employed to excite the people of the vicinity against the factory."

"If you are so inferior in numbers," said the Marshal, "we must first barricade all the doors, and then ——"

He could not finish. A loud burst of savage cries made the very glasses in the window-frames shake, and so near and so astounding, that the Marshal, his father, and the young workman, went out instantly into the garden, bounded on one side by a tolerably high wall, which was bounded by the fields.

Suddenly, and then the violence, the shoutings, and uproar redoubled; a shower of stones and numerous flints, intended to break the windows of the house, smashed in several panes on the first-floor, and glancing back on the wall, fell in the garden, where the Marshal and his father were standing.

Singular fatality! The old man was struck on the head by a large stone, and staggered, then stooping forward, fell all bleeding into the arms of Marshal Simon, at the same moment that there resounded without, with increasing fury, the fierce cries of "Battle and Death to the Dévorans!"

CHAPTER XL.

THE LOUPS AND THE DÉVORANS.

It was a fearful thing to see this unrestrained mob whose first hostilities had been so disastrous to Marshal Simon's father.

One wing of the Maison Commune, where the garden wall ended on that side, looked on to the open fields; and it was here that the Loups had begun their attack.

The haste of the march, the halts which the troop had made at two public-houses on the way, the burning impatience of the struggle which was imminent, had more and more urged these men to fierce excitement.

The first volley of stones having been thrown, the majority of the assailants looked for fresh weapons on the ground: some, to pick up their supplies with greater ease, held their sticks between their teeth, others had put them against the wall; and here and there several groups clustered tumultuously around the ringleaders of the party. The best-clothed of these men wore blouses, or smock-frocks, with caps, some men covered only with rags; for, as we have already narrated a considerable number of the idlers of the Barriers, and vagabonds of all descriptions, with hang-dog countenances, had joined the troop of Wolves from idleness or curiosity. Several hideous women, clad in squalid tatters, who seemed to start up suddenly to accompany this villanous mob, associated with them; and, by their shrieks and language, still more inflamed their excited minds. One of these, tall, stout, with purple complexion, drunken eyes, and toothless gums, had a handkerchief bound round her head, from beneath which, her yellow and dishevelled hair escaped in tangled masses. She had a ragged gown, and a brown check shawl crossed over her breast, and tied in a knot behind her back. This hag seemed greatly enraged. She had tucked up her torn sleeves; in one hand she brandished a thick club, and in the other, she held a large stone. Her companions called her Ciboule (Onion).

This horrible wretch exclaimed in a hoarse voice,—

“How I long to bite the women of this factory! I’ll bleed ‘em!”

These savage words were received with loud applause by her companions; and with brutal shouts of “Vive Ciboule!” which excited her still more madly.

Amongst the other ringleaders was a little thin man, pale, and weasel-faced, having his black beard all round his chin and throat. He wore a scarlet Greek cap; and his long new blouse covered a very well-made pair of cloth trousers, and boots of best quality. This man was evidently of a different class in life to the others of the mob; and it was he who particularly took the lead in charging the workmen of the factory with behaving ill to, and speaking ill of, the inhabitants of the environs,—he shouted loudly; but had neither stick nor stone. A stout man, with very red face, and whose bass voice seemed as if it belonged to a chorister, said to him,—

“What! then you will not fire on these impious hounds, whose sins may draw down the cholera on the country, as monsieur the curé says.”

“I will fire better than you,” replied the weasel-faced man, with a peculiar and sinister smile.

“And what will you fire with?”

“Perhaps with this stone,” replied the little man, plucking up a large flint; but as he stooped, a bag, nearly filled, but very light, which appeared to have been fastened under his blouse, fell to the ground.

“Mind, you’ll lose your bag and your marbles!” said the other, “though it does not seem very heavy.”

“They are samples of wool,” replied the weasel-faced man, plucking up the bag with much haste, and concealing it as quickly as possible under his blouse: then he added, “But, attention! for I think the quarrier is going to speak.”

The individual who exercised the most complete ascendancy over this excited assemblage was this fierce quarrier. His gigantic height so completely elevated him above the multitude, that they could always see his enormous head enveloped in a ragged red handkerchief; his herculean shoulders, covered with a yellow goat-skin, elevated above the rest of this malevolent and swarming crowd, which was interspersed here and there with women’s caps, like so many white points.

Seeing to what a pitch of exasperation the multitude had reached, the small number of honest but mistaken workmen, who had been dragged into the dangerous enterprise, under a pretence of a companionship quarrel, dreading the consequences of the struggle, endeavoured but too late, to leave the party; but environed and huddled together in the midst of the most hostile of the group, fearing to be branded as cowards, or to be attacked by the majority of the party they had joined, were awaiting the most favourable opportunity to effect their escape.

A profound silence succeeded the savage shouts which had accompanied the first volley of stones, which was broken by the stentorian voice of the quarrier.

"The Wolves have howled," he exclaimed; "we will wait a moment and see if the Dévorans will reply and give battle."

"We must get them all out of the factory, and try and make them fight on neutral ground," said the little weasel-faced man, who appeared to be the "standing counsel" of the band, "or else it will be a violation of domicile."

"Violation! what do we care for violation?" cried the horrible hag called Ciboule; "either inside or outside, I will tear out some of the eyes of those polecats in the factory."

"Yes, yes," shouted the other hideous beldams, as ragged and raving as Ciboule, "yes, you men are not to have it all to yourselves."

"We will have our share!"

"The women of the factory say that all the women of the neighbourhood are drunkards and ——" exclaimed the little weasel-faced man.

"We'll pay 'em off for that!"

"We women must have our share in the battle!"

"This is our affair!"

"As they have singers in their Maison Commune," shouted Ciboule, "we'll teach them the air of 'au secours, on m'assassiné,' (help! I am being murdered!)"

This brutal jest was hailed with cries, bravos, and tremendous stamping of feet, to which the stentor voice of the quarrier put an end by shouting, "Silence!"

"Silence!—silence!" echoed the crowd; "hark to the quarrier!"

"If the Dévorans are such curs as not to dare to venture out after the second volley of stones, there is a door I see there,—we will break in by that, and trace them to their holes."

"It would be better to draw them out to fight, so that not one of them remain in the interior of the factory," said the little weasel-faced man, who evidently had some design in what he suggested.

"Oh, let's fight where we can!" exclaimed the quarrier, with a voice of thunder; "so that we can get them to 'the scratch,'—that's all! We can fight on the edge of a wall or the roof of a house, can't we, Wolves?"

"Yes, yes!" said the mob, excited by the quarrier's savage air; "if they won't come out, we'll force our way in."

"We'll see the inside of their palace!"

"These pagans haven't even a chapel," said the bass voice; "M. le curé has damned them all."

"Why should they live in a palace, and we in dog-holes?"

"Why, Hardy's work-people say that dog-holes are too good for such scum of the earth as you," cried the little man with the weasel face.

"Yes, yes, they did say so!"

"Then we'll smash every thing before us!"

"We'll demolish their fine bazar!"

"We'll turn their house out of windows!"

"And when we have made the —— sing one of their squalling ditties," screamed Ciboule, "we will teach them how to dance with stones on their heads."

"Now then, my Loups, attention!" cried the quarrier, in his stentorian voice, "one volley more, and if the Dévorans will not leave their holes, then down with the door."

This proposition was received with the most fierce uproar, and the quarrier, whose voice was heard above the tumult, exclaimed at the top of his powerful lungs,—

"Now then, Wolves, attention!—stones in hand, and together! Are you ready?"

"All ready!"

"Then fire!"

And, for the second time, a cloud of stones and heavy flints were dashed furiously against the façade of the Maison Commune, which looked into the fields. Some of those projectiles broke the window-panes which had escaped the first attack; and to the sharp sound of the smashed windows were added fierce shouts, all uttered simultaneously, and like a threatening chorus, by this crowd, drunken by its own excess.

"Battle and death to the Dévorans!"

But these cries became literally frantic, when, through the broken windows, the assailants saw women, who were passing and repassing, running backwards and forwards, full of alarm, some carrying children others tossing their arms in the air, and calling for help, whilst some more bold, opened the windows and stooped out, in order to try and close the exterior shutters.

"Are these not the ants moving?" shouted Ciboule, stooping to pick up a stone; "we will help them to a few flints!"

And the stone flung by the masculine and practised hand of the beldam struck an unlucky woman who, leaning out of the window, was trying to draw the shutter towards her.

"A hit!—I have touched the bull's eye!" exclaimed the hideous creature.

"Well aimed—well hit, Ciboule!" cried a voice.

"Ciboule for ever!"

"Come out, you Dévorans, if you dare!"

"You have said a hundred times that the people of the neighbourhood were too great cowards even to come and look at your house," said the little weasel-faced man.

"They're making up their minds!"

"If they won't come out," shouted the quarrier, in a voice of thunder, "we'll smoke 'em out!"

"Yes, so we will!"

"Let us drive in the door!"

"We must find 'em!"

"Come on—come on!"

And the crowd, headed by the quarrier, who was closely followed by Ciboule, brandishing a stick, marched forward with a loud uproar, towards a large door which was at a short distance.

The resounding earth seemed to tremble beneath the hasty trampling of the mob, which was then silent; and this confused, and as it were, subterranean noise, seemed even more threatening than the loud shouting.

The Loups soon reached the door, which was of massive oak.

At the moment when the quarrier raised his heavy stone-cutter's hammer to strike against one of the folding-doors, it suddenly opened.

Some of the more resolute of the assailants were about to rush in by this entrance, but the quarrier retreated, extending his arms as if to moderate their ardour, and silence his party, who then grouped and collected themselves around him.

The half-opened door revealed a body of workmen (unfortunately but very few), but whose countenances bespoke resolution. They were hastily armed with pitch-forks, iron tongs, and sticks. Agricola at their head, held in his hand his heavy smith's hammer.

The young workman was very pale, but it was easy to see by the sparkle of his eyes, his bold air, and his determined demeanour, that his father's blood was boiling in his veins, and that, in such a struggle, he would become a terrible antagonist. Yet he restrained himself and said to the quarrier, in a firm voice,—

"What do you want?"

"Battle!" shouted the quarrier, with a voice of thunder.

"Yes, yes!—battle!" echoed the crowd.

"Silence, my Wolves!" cried the quarrier, turning round, and spreading his large hand towards the multitude.

Then addressing Agricola,—

"The Wolves demand battle."

"With whom?"

"With the Dévorans."

"There are no Dévorans here," replied Agricola,— "there are none but peaceable workmen, so retire!"

"Well, then, the Wolves will eat the peaceable workmen."

"The Wolves will not eat any one," said Agricola, looking full in the face at the quarrier, who approached him with a threatening aspect; "and the Wolves will make none afraid but little children."

"Oh! you think so?" said the quarrier, with a ferocious grin.

Then uplifting his heavy stone-cutter's hammer, he put it close to Agricola's nose, saying,—

"Is this a thing to laugh at?"

"And this?" said Agricola, who, by a rapid motion, met and vigorously repulsed the stone-cutter's hammer with his smith's hammer.

"Iron against iron—hammer against hammer!—I like that," said the quarrier.

"We do not know or care for what you like," replied Agricola, hardly containing himself; "you have broken our windows, frightened our women, and wounded, perhaps, killed, the oldest workman in the factory, who is at this moment in his son's arms;" and Agricola's voice quivered in spite of himself;—"that is enough, I should think."

THE BATTLE.

"No! the Wolves are more hungry than that," replied the quarrier; "you must come out from where you are, you set of curs, into the open field, and give us battle."

"Yes, battle! Make them come out! Battle! battle!" shouted the mob, groaning, whistling, shaking their sticks, and closing up, so as to narrow still more the small space which separated them from the door.

"We do not want any fighting," replied Agricola, "and we shall not leave this place; but, if you are fool-hardy enough, pass this;" and Agricola threw his cap on the threshold, and put his foot on it with an intrepid air. "Yes; if you pass this, then you will attack us in our home, and you will be responsible for all that happens."

"In your home or elsewhere, we will fight it out. The Wolves will eat the Dévorans; and so now for your attack," said the savage quarrier, raising his hammer against Agricola.

But the latter, moving aside by a rapid motion of his body, avoided the blow, and dashed his hammer at the breast of the quarrier, who was driven back a step or two; but, recovering his balance, rushed furiously at Agricola, shouting, "Forward, my Wolves!"

CHAPTER XLI.

THE RETURN.

THE contest between Agricola and the quarryman was the signal for a general mêlée of the most determined and sanguinary kind. A dense mass of the assailants, following closely in the quarrier's wake, pressed towards this point of attack with irresistible fury; while a considerable portion of the besiegers, unable to pass the confused heap of struggling beings, who were trampling on each other in fearful confusion—the stronger pitilessly crushing his fallen brethren without compunction or remorse—broke down a trellis which surmounted a hedge, and, pouring in upon the astonished workmen belonging to the factory, in a manner hemmed them in between two fires. For a time, the attacked party resisted courageously; but, perceiving Ciboule followed by some of her horrible associates and a quantity of the loose hangers-on of the Barriers, whose evil countenances sufficiently attested their lawless designs, rushing up the staircase leading to the Maison Commune, where the women and children had taken refuge, the greater number precipitately pursued, in dread of the consequences to the weaker part of the establishment. Seeing the interruption offered to their progress, some of Ciboule's companions turned quickly round upon the workmen, and effectually cut off the pursuit by the staircase; while the hag herself, attended by a rabble of both sexes, made their way, without molestation, into the chambers they approached, plundering or destroying all that fell in their way.

A door, which at first resisted their efforts, was quickly broken open; and Ciboule, brandishing her staff, and half wild with savage triumph, rushed in, her lank locks floating over her hideous countenance. Within the apartment was a second door, conducting to an inner apartment, and before it knelt a beautiful girl (it was Angèle), who seemed as though she had previously endeavoured to defend the entrance against the intruders, by throwing her slender weight against the door by which the rioters had entered. Pale as marble, the terrified girl, without rising from her knees, exclaimed, in supplicating tones,—

“I implore of you not to harm my mother!”

“No, no!” screamed the disgusting hag, “we will tackle you first; your mother shall come next!” and, suiting the action to the word, Ciboule grasped the half-fainting girl in her hard, coarse grasp; while the rest of her companions occupied themselves in smashing the various articles of furniture with their bludgeons, or in stealing whatever was portable. Struggling alike to escape from the infuriated rage of Ciboule, and to prevent her entering the chamber in which her mother had taken refuge, Angèle uttered loud and piercing cries; while her parent, leaning from her window, called upon Agricola to come to their assistance. The smith had commenced a second deadly encounter with the quarryman. Their hammers were useless in the close quarters to which they had now come. With glaring eyeballs and clenched teeth, they fought with deadly and determined fury; chest against chest; wrestling, twisting in each other’s firm embrace; both striving by every art to throw his antagonist. Agricola, who was stooping, held the left leg of his adversary under his right arm, having accomplished this manœuvre when bending to avoid a violent kick aimed at him by his enemy; but such was the herculean power possessed by the chief of the Loups, that, although obliged to support himself entirely on one leg, he stood fixed and immovable as a tower of stone. With the hand which was free (the other was gripped by Agricola as though fixed in a vice) he sought, by repeated blows, to break the jaws of the young smith, who, with bent head, was using his forehead with all his might against the hollow of his adversary’s chest.

“Here goes to knock all the teeth out of the Dévorant’s mouth!” cried the quarrier. “He will neither eat his own bread nor that of the Loups for the future!”

“You are no Loup!” exclaimed the young smith, redoubling his efforts. “The real Loups are brave fellows, who would be ashamed to fight ten men against one.”

“Loup or not, I mean to smash your teeth for you!”

“Take care I do not first spoil you for breaking into people’s dwellings, by sending you home lame of a leg.”

So saying, the smith dealt so violent a blow on the quarryman’s leg, that, uttering a scream of agony, the latter, suddenly stretching out his head, bit Agricola deep on the side of his neck, with all the savage fury of a wild beast. The sudden agony occasioned by this brutal attack caused the smith to let go his assailant’s leg; when, making an almost superhuman effort, the quarryman threw himself, with all his weight, upon Agricola, who staggered, and fell under him.

At this instant, the mother of Angèle, leaning from one of the upper windows, screamed out in accents of distress, “Help! help! M. Agricola; my child is being murdered!”

"Let me go!" exclaimed Agricola, gasping for breath; "let me go, I say, and, upon the word of an honest man, I promise to finish our quarrel to-morrow, or when you please!"

"No, no! no second-hand dishes for me. I like my meat when it is hot," returned the quarrier, seizing the young smith by the throat with one hand, while with the other he held him down, trying at the same time to kneel upon his chest.

"Help! for God's sake, help!" reiterated the mother of Angèle, in a distracted voice, "or my daughter will be murdered!"

"Mercy, mercy! I ask for mercy," exclaimed Agricola, striving by the most desperate efforts to escape from his adversary. "Let me go, I say!"

"I can't," replied the quarryman; "I have too much pleasure in breaking your bones!"

Rendered furious by his dread of the peril Angèle might be in, Agricola redoubled his efforts; when, just as his strength was failing him, an unexpected turn was given to the combat. The quarryman felt himself seized by a sharp set of teeth on the fleshy part of his leg; while three or four powerful blows, dealt by a vigorous arm, were applied to his head. At once dismayed, and suffering too much pain to retain his hold of Agricola, the savage quarrier was compelled to let him go; while he endeavoured to defend himself from the blows, which, however, ceased directly he set Agricola free.

"Thanks, dear father!" cried the young smith, rising up; "you have saved my life. Heaven grant it may not be too late to save that of Angèle!"

"Run, run, my boy! never mind me!" exclaimed Dagobert; and, without waiting for a second bidding, Agricola rushed on towards the Maison Commune.

Accompanied by Kill-joy, Dagobert, as has been already mentioned, had attended the daughters of Marshal Simon to visit their grandfather. Arriving in the midst of the tumult, the soldier had rallied a party of the terrified workmen, and set them to defend the entrance of the chamber into which the father of the marshal had been carried; and it was from this post that the old veteran had observed the imminent danger of his son.

A rush of combatants soon separated Dagobert from the savage quarrier, who lay extended on the ground without speech or consciousness.

Agricola, flying on the wings of impatience, soon reached the staircase belonging to the Maison Commune, and, wrought up to more than his usual energy by the danger of her he loved, soon cleared his way through the opposing crowd, who in vain disputed his passage, and rushed towards the corridor, on which opened the chamber of Angèle. At the moment when he arrived there, the poor girl was mechanically defending her face with her two hands against Ciboule, who had fallen upon her like a hyena on her prey, and was endeavouring to scratch and tear her cheeks.

Agricola, with the speed of thought, rushed at the horrible hag, seized her by her yellow and matted locks with irresistible strength, and, flinging her from him, stretched her on her back with a violent and effective jerk.

Ciboule, though so rudely attacked, still exasperated with rage, rose instantly. At this moment several workmen, who had followed Agricola, were gaining the advantage in the contest, and whilst the smith lifted Angèle half-fainting in his arms, and conveyed her to another chamber, Ciboule and her gang were forcibly driven away from this part of the house.

After the first rally, the very small number of real Loups, who, as Agricola said, were steady workmen who had had the weakness to allow themselves to be ensnared into this enterprise under a pretext of a companionship quarrel, seeing the excess which the ruffians, who had accompanied them against their wills, had committed,—these brave Loups, we must state, suddenly took part with the Dévorans.

"It is no longer a question of Loups and Dévorans," said one of the most determined Loups to Olivier, with whom he had been boldly and freely fighting. "Here are none but honest workmen, who ought to unite to get rid of a gang of robbers, who have only come to rifle and rob."

"Yes," added another, "it was against our wishes that they began to break the windows of your house."

"It was the quarrier who begun all the riot," said another. "The real Loups repudiate it altogether. He will suffer for this."

"We may bully and squabble a bit with each other, but we do not esteem one another the less."*

This defection of a portion of the assailants, unhappily but a very small portion, still gave fresh courage to the workmen of the factory, and all Loups and Dévorans, although greatly inferior in numbers, united against the scamps of the Barriers and the other vagabonds who were advancing to such deplorable lengths.

One band of these wretches, excited and stimulated by the little weasel-faced man, the secret emissary of Baron Tripeaud, went in a body to the workshops of M. Hardy. Then there commenced a lamentable devastation, for these ruffians, full of rage and destruction, broke remorselessly machinery of the most costly description and tools of the most delicate construction; goods half completed were pitilessly destroyed, and a savage emulation exciting these villains, the workshops, so lately models of economical arrangement and orderly toil, now presented but broken fragments. The yards were blocked up with goods of all descriptions, which were flung out of the windows with fierce shouts or bursts of atrocious laughter. Then, too, thanks to the suggestions of the little weasel-faced man, M. Hardy's books of business, those commercial archives so indispensable to the merchant, were flung to the winds, torn, trampled under foot by a sort of infernal ring, composed of all that was most foul and infamous in this assemblage — men and women, dirty, ragged, and destructive, who had taken each other by the hand and were circling round whilst uttering horrid shrieks and clamour.

* We beg it may be understood by the reader that it is only the necessity of our story which has assigned to the Loups the character of aggressors. Whilst we are endeavouring to illustrate one of the abuses of companionship, which, by the way, are daily diminishing, we would not willingly assign a character of savage hostility to one party more than the other—to the Loups more than to the Dévorans. The Loups, who are stone-masons, are usually very hard-working, intelligent workmen, whose position is the more deserving of interest inasmuch as their labours of almost mathematical precision are severe and toilsome, and as their business sometimes stands still during three or four months of the year, it being one of those which the winter inevitably precludes. A great many Loups, in order to learn their trade thoroughly, follow every evening a course of lectures on linear geometry, applied to the cutting of stones, analogous to those taught by M. Agricola Perdiguier for carpenters. Several stone-masons exhibited an architectural model in plaster at the last exposition.

Strange and painful contrast! Within hearing of these horrible scenes of tumult and devastation a scene of painful and imposing calmness was going on in the chamber of Marshal Simon's father, where several devoted men were watching.

The old workman was stretched on a bed, his head wrapped in a bandage, under which were seen his grey and bloody locks; his features were livid, his respiration oppressed, and his eyes fixed, but without any sight in them. Marshal Simon, standing up at the head of the bed, bending over his parent, was gazing with anxiety and despair for the smallest sign of sense in the dying man, whose sinking pulse a doctor was feeling. Rose and Blanche, brought by Dagobert, were kneeling at the bed with their hands clasped, their eyes bathed in tears. A little farther off, and half hidden in the shadow of the chamber, for the hours had flown and night had come on, was Dagobert, with his arms folded over his breast and his features working convulsively.

There reigned a profound and solemn silence in the apartment, broken from time to time by the stifled sobs of Rose and Blanche, or by the painful breathings of old M. Simon.

The eyes of the marshal were dry, gloomy, and burning; he never moved them from off his father's face, unless to interrogate the doctor by his look.

There are singular fatalities. This doctor was M. Baleinier. The maison de santé of the doctor was very close to the nearest barrier of the factory, and being famous in the environs, they had run to his house first to seek medical assistance.

Suddenly Dr. Baleinier made a movement. Marshal Simon, who had not taken his eyes off him, exclaimed,—

"Hope!"

"At least, M. le Duc, the pulse is somewhat stronger."

"He is saved!" cried the marshal.

"Don't give way to false hopes, M. le Duc," replied the doctor, gravely; "the pulse is recovering, but it is the result of the powerful stimuli which I have applied to his feet; but I cannot pronounce as to what may be the issue of this crisis."

"My father, my father! do you hear me?" exclaimed the marshal, when he saw the old man make a slight movement of the head and his eyelids worked gently.

In effect he soon opened his eyes, and intelligence beamed in them once more.

"Father, you live! Do you recognise me?" exclaimed the marshal overcome by joy and hope.

"Pierre, are you there?" said the old man, in a feeble tone. "Your hand,—give ——" And he moved a little.

"There, dear father!" cried the marshal, pressing the old man's hand in his own.

Then yielding to a burst of irrepressible joy, he threw his arms around his parent and covered his hands, face, and grey hair with kisses, exclaiming,— “Thanks, thanks, my God! he is spared! he lives, he lives!”

At this instant the noise and tumult, occasioned by the renewal of the combat between the Loups and Dévorans, reached even the ears of the dying man.

“That noise, that noise!” cried he. “What means it, and those wild shouts? Are our people fighting?”

“It is all over now, I believe,” said the marshal, hoping to tranquillise his parent.

“Pierre,” said the old man, in a feeble and broken tone, “I have not—long to ——”

“Dearest father!”

“My son, my beloved son!—let me speak to you—while—I am yet able,—let me tell you ——”

“Sir,” said Baleinier, earnestly to the old workman, “Heaven may yet work a miracle in your favour. Seek to invoke its aid through the mediation of a priest. Let us send for some holy man!”

“I thank you, sir,” replied the old artisan; “but I need no priest. I have lived a long and an honest life, and fear not to resign my spirit unto Him who gave it. But my last sighs shall be breathed in the arms of my worthy and excellent son!”

“Talk not of dying, my father, I implore you,” cried the marshal. “It cannot—must not be!”

“Pierre,” said the old man, in a tone which, though firm at first, became gradually weaker and weaker, “you asked me a short time since my advice—touching an affair of deep importance,—and it almost seems as though the desire—to point out to you—what your duty to yourself and others requires of you—has recalled me for a time to life,—for I could not die in peace—if I knew you were about to commit any action unworthy—of you or your family. Listen, then,—my son—my brave, my beloved son. At this solemn moment—a parent cannot give wrong counsel;—you have a weighty and most serious duty to perform,—therefore, as you would act as becomes a man of honour,—and avoid disobedience to my dying commands,—you must—unhesitatingly ——”

The old man’s voice became more and more feeble, and by the time he had uttered the last words it was entirely unintelligible. The only words which, by bending closely over his father, the marshal could distinguish were “Napoleon II.—oath—dishonour—my son.” After which the lips of the old workman continued for some time to move mechanically, and then—all was over.

At the moment when M. Simon expired, the stillness of the night was disturbed by loud and frenzied cries of “Fire, fire!” and flames burst out from a portion of the workrooms filled with inflammable materials, and into which the little weasel-faced man had been seen to glide; while from afar might be heard the beating of drums, announcing the approach of a detachment of troops sent for from the Barrier.

* * * * *

Spite of every effort to subdue the fire, the flames had now for more than an hour preyed upon the manufactory, and in the clear frostiness of the starlight night it blazed and crackled as the strong northerly wind increased its fury. An individual was at this moment making his way across the fields, but prevented by an elevation of the ground before him from seeing the fire. This person was M. Hardy, who had chosen to walk home across the fields, in the hopes of finding relief from the fever which preyed upon him—a fever deadly as the aguish shiver of a dying man.

He had been told but too true a tale: the adored mistress, the noble-minded woman, whose affection would have consoled him for the fearful deception practised on him, had quitted France! Alas! there was no reason to doubt it. Marguerite had departed for America; and, in obedience to her mother's commands, had not even written one line to reconcile him to her loss. Her mother had exacted from her that she should thus bitterly expiate her forgetfulness of her marriage vows, and Marguerite had obeyed the stern decree. Often had she said to her lover, "I could never hesitate between my mother's wishes and your affection." Too faithfully had she followed this doctrine of maternal obedience; she was gone, and no hope—no, not the faintest glimmer, remained. The ocean rolled its waters between himself and the object of his love, whom he knew to be too blindly obedient and submissive to her mother to leave a hope of ever again beholding her. No, all was ended between them, and each was to the other as though such a being had never existed. So that he could no more promise himself the soft sympathy of Marguerite's love to console him for the shock his heart had received in the treachery of his dearest friend. Thus, then, were the two most cherished objects of his soul torn away, plucked rudely forth from the heart in which they were enshrined, broken, destroyed for ever, and that at the same time—almost by the same blow.

What, then, is left the poor sensitive being a doating mother called her mimosa?—where shall he seek consolation for his lost love?—or whither turn for healing-balm to cure those wounds perfidy and treachery had dealt by the hands of him he esteemed as a second brother? Bethink thee, thou heart-stricken mourner, of that blessed spot thou createdst after thine own image—of that happy, flourishing colony where, thanks to thee, labour reaps its reward and full enjoyments—think of the worthy fellows who hourly bless thy name, who hast rendered them prosperous and respectable as men, and whose well-merited gratitude will ever be yours. With them you will find a true and noble affection and gratitude; return, then, to the worthy artisans, who will hail thy coming with unmixed and unfeigned joy, and there be thine asylum—thy shelter, amid all the wreck of thy hopes and dreams of trust and affection.

The peaceful calm of this smiling retreat, the sight of the matchless happiness enjoyed there by the beings thou hast so largely benefited, will heal thy lacerated wounds and pour comfort into thy bleeding heart.

Yet a little farther, and thou mayest behold from the summit of yonder hill, afar off in the plain, that paradise of labour and for such as labour, erected by thee, and where thou art deservedly worshipped and blessed as a god.

M. Hardy ascended the small elevation which had hitherto concealed the factory from his view.

At this moment the flames, which had been for a time repressed, broke out with additional fury from the windows of the Maison Commune, whither the conflagration had now extended.

A bright light, first white, and then glowing red and deep copper colour, illumined the horizon for miles round.

M. Hardy gazed with a species of bewildered stupefaction at the appalling sight.

All at once an immense body of flames rushed up amid a whirlwind of smoke, accompanied by a shower of glittering sparks and pieces of fire, lighting up the country for a considerable distance, and bringing its glowing reflection to the very spot where M. Hardy stood. The violence of the northerly wind alternately driving and repressing the flames which curled and wreathed beneath its influence, quickly brought to the ears of its wretched owner the hurried sounds of the alarm-bell belonging to the blazing factory.

PART IX.

THE BLACK PANTHER OF JAVA.

---

CHAPTER XLII.

THE NEGOTIATOR.

A FEW days have elapsed since the burning down of M. Hardy's factory. The following scene takes place in the Rue Clovis, in the house where Rodin had a lodging, which he had now quitted, the house, also, inhabited by Rose-Pompon, who, without the slightest scruple, availed herself of the menage of her friend Philemon.

It was about noon ; Rose-Pompon was alone in the student's chamber, breakfasting very gaily at the corner of her fire. But what a singular breakfast ! — what a peculiar fire ! — what an odd chamber !

Let the reader imagine a tolerably large apartment, lighted up by two windows without curtains ; for as the look-out was an open space, the occupier of the room had no fear of curious eyes. One side of the room served for dressing in, and there hung, on a large cloak-pin, the gallant Débardeur's costume, appertaining unto Rose-Pompon ; not far from the waterman's vest, belonging unto the Philemon aforesaid, with his wide trousers of coarse grey cloth, as entirely smeared all over with tar, thousand portholes, thousand sharks, thousand whales, as if this intrepid navigator had occupied the maintop of a frigate during a voyage round the world. A gown of Rose-Pompon's hung gracefully over the legs of a pair of pantaloons with feet to them, which seemed as if coming out of the bottom of the skirt. Placed on the lower shelf of a small bookcase, very dusty and neglected, there was, beside three old boots (why three boots ?) and a considerable amount of empty bottles, a death's head, a souvenir of astrology and friendship, left to Philemon by a friend and fellow-student in medicine. With a pleasantry very common in the Pays Latin (the quarter in which the medical students in Paris "most do congregate") this head held between its teeth, which were splendidly white, a clay tobacco-pipe, with a blackened bowl ; besides this, the shining skull was half concealed beneath an old rakish-looking hat, put on knowingly on one side, and covered with faded flowers and ribands. When Philemon was drunk, he used very gravely to contemplate this ossuary, and gave vent to sundry monologues of dithyrambic vein, relative to the philosophical connexion between death and the foolish joys of this life.

Two or three plaster masks, with their repulsive noses and chins, more or less dilapidated, were nailed to the wall, testifying the temporary bent Philemon had had for the science of phrenology, that patient and reflective study, whence he had drawn the undeniable conclusion,—that having, to an extraordinary degree, the bump of debt, it was necessary that he should resign himself to the fatality of his organisation, which imposed on him a creditor as a vital necessity.

On the mantel-piece stood intact, and in all its majesty, the monster glass of the aquatic, in full costume, having on the one side a china tea-pot, which had lost its spout, and flanked on the other by an inkstand of black wood, whose orifice was half concealed beneath a green and mossy bed of vegetation.

From time to time the silence of this retreat was interrupted by the cooing of the pigeons, to whom Rose-Pompon had given a cordial hospitality in Philemon's study. Chilly as a quail, Rose-Pompon kept close to the fire-side, and seemed to rejoice greatly in the soothing influence of the sunbeams which shone brightly upon her.

The whimsical little creature had on a very odd costume, but one which singularly brought out her fresh youth of seventeen, her piquante features, and her attractive manner, whilst her beautiful light hair was (as usual) carefully combed and arranged.

Rose-Pompon had, with great ingenuity, put on over her own chemise the large scarlet woollen shirt of Philemon, a part and parcel of his rowing costume. The collar, open and falling down, shewed the whiteness of the young girl's own garment, whilst her own neck and dimpled shoulder were so fair that the scarlet shirt seemed reflected in them with a rosy tint. Her fresh and well-turned arms came from beneath the large tucked-up sleeves, and her well-formed legs, crossed over each other, were clad in a tight white silk stocking, met at the ankle by a small slipper. A black silk handkerchief fastened the scarlet shirt round the wasp-like waist of Rose-Pompon, and gave to the attire a grace worthy of a modern Phidias, and perfectly original.

We have said that the fire at which Rose-Pompon was singular; our reader may judge. The extravagant jade, the prodigal puss, finding herself short of wood, was economically warming herself with Philemon's boot-trees, which, it must be confessed, offered to the eye a combustible which burnt with admirable regularity.

We have also said that Rose-Pompon's breakfast was singular; let the reader judge. On a small table placed before her was the basin into which she had recently dipped her fresh and pretty face, in water no less fresh; from the bottom of this basin, now metamorphosed into a salad bowl, Rose-Pompon took, it must be confessed with the tips of her finger, some large leaves of salad, as green as grass, and seasoned with vinegar, enough to choke most persons; then she crunched these verdant vegetables with all the power of her small white teeth, whose enamel was proof against all such dangers, whilst, as a beverage, she had mixed a glass of water in syrup of currants, and stirred up the mixture with a small wooden mustard-spoon. As a wind-up, there were a dozen olives in one of those little blue and opaque glass trays, that fetch about thirteen pence half-penny; and her dessert consisted of nuts, which were being half roasted on a shovel nearly red-hot from the flames of Philemon's boot-trees.

That Rose-Pompon, with food of such incredible and wild taste, was worthy of her name, from the brilliancy of her complexion, is one of those divine miracles which reveal the omnipotence of youth and health.

Rose-Pompon, after having crunched her salad, was about to munch her olives, when a gentle tap was heard on the door, which was discreetly bolted withinside.

"Who's there?" said Rose-Pompon.

"A friend—an old acquaintance," replied a sonorous and mirthful voice; "why have you fastened your door?"

"What! is it you, Nini-Moulin?"

"Yes, my beloved ward. Open instantly—my business is urgent."

"Open to you—really now—what, as I am?—that would be nice!"

"I should say so!—as you are now would be nice—very nice, indeed! Ah! rosiest of all the roses that the little god Cupid ever nestled amongst!"

"Go—go, and preach Lent and morality in your newspaper, fat apostle!" said Rose-Pompon, returning the scarlet shirt to the rest of Philemon's costume.

"Ah, now, are we really going to have a long talk in this way through the key-hole, for the extreme edification of all the neighbours?" said Nini-Moulin. "You must reflect that I have very important things to tell you—things that will astonish your weak nerves."

"Well, then, give me time just to slip on my gown, you old plague!"

"Oh! if you are afraid of shocking my modesty, I beg you will not overrate my delicacy. I am not at all squeamish, and am quite willing to take you as you are."

"Here's a pretty darling for the sanctified elect!" said Rose-Pompon, opening the door with one hand, whilst, with the other, she finished fastening her dress about her nymph-like shape.

"Well, here you are back again in your dove-cote, pretty bird of passage!" said Nini-Moulin, crossing his arms and looking at Rose-Pompon, with a serio-comic air. "And whence have you arrived, I should like to know? For three whole days you have not perched here, naughty little dove!"

"Quite correct, Nini; I only returned last night. So, then, you called during my absence?"

"Every day, and sometimes twice a-day, mademoiselle, for I have very serious things to talk to you about."

"Serious things!—oh, then, what a laugh we shall have!"

"Quite the contrary, it is a very serious affair," said Nini-Moulin, seating himself. "But, in the first place, what have you been doing during the three days that you have deserted this domicile, so conjugal and Philemonic? I must know that before I say another word."

"Will you have some olives?" said Rose-Pompon, as she masticated one of the oleaginous berries.

"Oh! that's your answer;—I take. Unhappy Philemon!"

"There's no unhappy Philemon in the case, slanderer. Clara has had a death in her house, and during the first few days after the burial, she was afraid of sleeping alone all night."

"I thought Clara was quite well provided against all such alarms."

"Then, great viper, you are mistaken, for I went to the poor girl's to keep her company."

At this declaration the religious writer hummed between his teeth, with an air perfectly incredulous and derisive.

"What! you mean to insinuate that I have been playing Philemon some tricks?" exclaimed Rose-Pompon, cracking a nut with all the indignation of virtue unjustly suspected.

"I did not say tricks, but one little trick, small, and couleur de Rose-Pompon."

"I repeat to you that it was not for my pleasure that I went away from here, on the contrary, for, during the time, poor, dear Céphyse has gone away."

"Yes, the Queen-Bacchanal has gone on her travels; Mother Arsène told me that. But when I talk to you of Philemon, you answer me with Céphyse, and that is not a clear way of reply."

"May I be eaten up by the black panther which they shew at the Porte-Sainte Martin, if I do not speak true. And, à propos of that, you must have two stalls, and take me to see these animals, my dear Nini-Moulin; they tell me these savage brutes are such loves."

"Why, are you mad?"

"Mad?"

"True, I may guide your youth as a rollicking grandpa, in the midst of tulips, more or less storm-blown; true, but I do not risk finding any of my pious paymasters there; but to take you to a Lent spectacle, for there are nothing but the beasts to be seen, why I should meet nothing but the 'elect,' and very nice I should look with you under my arm!"

"Put on a false nose, and straps under your trousers, my stout darling, and no one would know thee."

"I am not talking about false noses, but of what I have to tell you, since you assure me you have no new love-affair on hand."

"I swear it," said Rose-Pompon, solemnly, extending her left hand horizontally, whilst with the right she conveyed a nut between her teeth, and then she added, with a surprised air, as she contemplated the crammed pockets of Nini-Moulin's paletot-sac:—

"Ah! what great pockets you have got! What can you have stuffed in them?"

"Matters which concern you, Rose-Pompon," replied Dumoulin, in a serious tone.

"Me?"

"Rose-Pompon," said Nini-Moulin, with a majestic air, "would you like a carriage? Can you prefer a splendid suite of rooms to this frightful dog-hole? Would you like to be a duchess?"

"Nonsense — more fun! Come, will you take some olives? — if not, I shall finish them all — there's only one left."

Without replying to this gastronomic offer, Nini-Moulin rummaged in one of his pockets, whence he extracted a case containing a very pretty bracelet, which he dangled before the eyes of the young girl.

"Oh, what a love of a bracelet!" she said, clasping her two small hands together. "A green snake biting his tail — emblem of my love for Philemon."

"Don't mention Philemon's name, it annoys me," said Nini-Moulin, clasping the bracelet round Rose-Pompon's wrist, who made no opposition, but laughed like a mad thing, and said,—

"It is a purchase you have had to make for some one, stout apostle, and you want to try the effect. Well, really it is a very charming trinket."

"Rose-Pompon," replied Nini-Moulin, "will you or will you not have servants, an opera-box, and a thousand francs a-month for the expenses of your toilette?"

"Still carrying on the joke? Go on, go on," said the young girl, making the bracelet sparkle whilst she ate the nuts. "But why do you keep on at the same jest; why don't you find some others?"

Nini-Moulin's hand again dived into his pocket, and this time he drew out a magnificent chain and châtelaine, which he put round Rose-Pompon's neck.

"Oh, what a duck of a chain!" exclaimed the young girl, looking alternately at the sparkling gem and the religious writer. "If you also selected this, you have really excellent taste; but ain't I a good girl to allow myself to be made into a show window for your trinkets?"

"Rose-Pompon!" said Nini-Moulin, even more majestically than before, "these trifles are nothing compared with what you may aspire to, if you listen to the counsels of your old friend."

Rose-Pompon began to look at Dumoulin with surprise, and said to him, "What does this mean, Nini-Moulin? Explain, I beg of you. What counsels do you mean?"

Dumoulin made no reply, but again dipping his hand into his unwearied pockets, he this time drew forth a parcel which he carefully untied. It was a splendid mantilla of black lace.

Rose-Pompon arose full of fresh admiration, and Dumoulin adroitly threw the rich mantilla over the shoulders of the young girl.

"What a superb one! I never saw its fellow! What a lovely pattern, and how splendidly embroidered!" said Rose-Pompon, examining it with close scrutiny, and, it must be added, with utter disinterestedness; then she added, "Why, have you got a whole shop in your pocket? Where did you get so many fine things?" Then bursting into a fit of laughter, which suffused her lovely face, she added, "I know—I know, it is the wedding paraphernalia of Madame Sainte-Colombe! Accept my congratulations!"

"And where should I fish for the wherewithal to buy all these wonderful affairs?" asked Nini-Moulin. "All this, I repeat, is yours, if you will have them, and listen to me!"

"What!" said Rose-Pompon, with amaze, "are you really serious?"

"Perfectly serious."

"Your proposal to live as a great lady?"

"These jewels are the guarantee of the reality of these offers."

"And is it you, my poor dear Nini-Moulin, who propose this to me on behalf of another?"

had a death in her house, and during the first few days after the burial, she was afraid of sleeping alone all night."

"I thought Clara was quite well provided against all such alarms."

"Then, great viper, you are mistaken, for I went to the poor girl's to keep her company."

At this declaration the religious writer hummed between his teeth, with an air perfectly incredulous and derisive.

"What! you mean to insinuate that I have been playing Philemon some tricks?" exclaimed Rose-Pompon, cracking a nut with all the indignation of virtue unjustly suspected.

"I did not say tricks, but one little trick, small, and couleur de Rose-Pompon."

"I repeat to you that it was not for my pleasure that I went away from here, on the contrary, for, during the time, poor, dear Céphyse has gone away."

"Yes, the Queen-Bacchanal has gone on her travels; Mother Arsène told me that. But when I talk to you of Philemon, you answer me with Céphyse, and that is not a clear way of reply."

"May I be eaten up by the black panther which they shew at the Porte-Sainte Martin, if I do not speak true. And, à propos of that, you must have two stalls, and take me to see these animals, my dear Nini-Moulin; they tell me these savage brutes are such loves."

"Why, are you mad?"

"Mad?"

"True, I may guide your youth as a rollicking grandpa, in the midst of tulips, more or less storm-blown; true, but I do not risk finding any of my pious paymasters there; but to take you to a Lent spectacle, for there are nothing but the beasts to be seen, why I should meet nothing but the 'elect,' and very nice I should look with you under my arm!"

"Put on a false nose, and straps under your trousers, my stout darling, and no one would know thee."

"I am not talking about false noses, but of what I have to tell you, since you assure me you have no new love-affair on hand."

"I swear it," said Rose-Pompon, solemnly, extending her left hand horizontally, whilst with the right she conveyed a nut between her teeth, and then she added, with a surprised air, as she contemplated the crammed pockets of Nini-Moulin's paletot-sac:—

"Ah! what great pockets you have got! What can you have stuffed in them?"

"Matters which concern you, Rose-Pompon," replied Dumoulin, in a serious tone.

"Me?"

"Rose-Pompon," said Nini-Moulin, with a majestic air, "would you like a carriage? Can you prefer a splendid suite of rooms to this frightful dog-hole? Would you like to be a duchess?"

"Nonsense — more fun! Come, will you take some olives? — if not, I shall finish them all — there's only one left."

Without replying to this gastronomic offer, Nini-Moulin rummaged in one of his pockets, whence he extracted a case containing a very pretty bracelet, which he dangled before the eyes of the young girl.

"Oh, what a love of a bracelet!" she said, clasping her two small hands together. "A green snake biting his tail — emblem of my love for Philemon."

"Don't mention Philemon's name, it annoys me," said Nini-Moulin, clasping the bracelet round Rose-Pompon's wrist, who made no opposition, but laughed like a mad thing, and said,—

"It is a purchase you have had to make for some one, stout apostle, and you want to try the effect. Well, really it is a very charming trinket."

"Rose-Pompon," replied Nini-Moulin, "will you or will you not have servants, an opera-box, and a thousand francs a-month for the expenses of your toilette?"

"Still carrying on the joke? Go on, go on," said the young girl, making the bracelet sparkle whilst she ate the nuts. "But why do you keep on at the same jest; why don't you find some others?"

Nini-Moulin's hand again dived into his pocket, and this time he drew out a magnificent chain and châtelaine, which he put round Rose-Pompon's neck.

"Oh, what a duck of a chain!" exclaimed the young girl, looking alternately at the sparkling gem and the religious writer. "If you also selected this, you have really excellent taste; but ain't I a good girl to allow myself to be made into a show window for your trinkets?"

"Rose-Pompon!" said Nini-Moulin, even more majestically than before, "these trifles are nothing compared with what you may aspire to, if you listen to the counsels of your old friend."

Rose-Pompon began to look at Dumoulin with surprise, and said to him, "What does this mean, Nini-Moulin? Explain, I beg of you. What counsels do you mean?"

Dumoulin made no reply, but again dipping his hand into his unwearied pockets, he this time drew forth a parcel which he carefully untied. It was a splendid mantilla of black lace.

Rose-Pompon arose full of fresh admiration, and Dumoulin adroitly threw the rich mantilla over the shoulders of the young girl.

"What a superb one! I never saw its fellow! What a lovely pattern, and how splendidly embroidered!" said Rose-Pompon, examining it with close scrutiny, and, it must be added, with utter disinterestedness; then she added, "Why, have you got a whole shop in your pocket? Where did you get so many fine things?" Then bursting into a fit of laughter, which suffused her lovely face, she added, "I know—I know, it is the wedding paraphernalia of Madame Sainte-Colombe! Accept my congratulations!"

"And where should I fish for the wherewithal to buy all these wonderful affairs?" asked Nini-Moulin. "All this, I repeat, is yours, if you will have them, and listen to me!"

"What!" said Rose-Pompon, with amaze, "are you really serious?"

"Perfectly serious."

"Your proposal to live as a great lady?"

"These jewels are the guarantee of the reality of these offers."

"And is it you, my poor dear Nini-Moulin, who propose this to me on behalf of another?"

"One minute, if you please," said the religious writer, with an air of comic solemnity; "you ought to know me too well, O most cherished of wards! not to feel quite sure I should be the last person to persuade you to any improper proceeding. No, I have too much self-respect for that; even if I could forget that my so doing would be an insult to Philemon, who has confided to me the charge of your virtue and morality!"

"Come, Nini-Moulin," said Rose Pompon, more and more bewildered, "leave off talking all this nonsense; for upon my word and honour, I don't understand a word you are saying."

"Yet nothing can be more simple — I —"

"Oh, now I see!" exclaimed Rose-Pompon, interrupting Nini-Moulin; "somebody has fallen in love with me, and sends you to offer me his hand and heart, with a few pretty little et-ceteras, just to coax me to accept them. Why could not you have said so at once?"

"Somebody wanting to marry you!" cried Dumoulin, shrugging up his shoulders; "I should rather think not!"

"Nothing about being married!" cried Rose-Pompon, falling back into her original surprise.

"Nothing whatever, my little dear."

"But the proposals you have to make are strictly correct, are they not, my fat apostle?"

"Pure as your own eyes, or diamonds of the first water." And here Dumoulin spoke the truth.

"You will not ask me to betray poor dear Philemon?"

"Not in the most trifling degree."

"Or bind me to be faithful to any one else?"

"Certainly not."

For a few moments, Rose-Pompon remained utterly speechless from utter confusion of ideas; then, impatient at all this bewilderment, she exclaimed, "Come now, do leave off all this nonsense. I am not quite such a simpleton as to imagine that any body would think it worth while to set me up for a duchess for nothing, for what should there be in my appearance to induce any person to take so much trouble about me?" said the sly girl, with a well-assumed expression of modest humility.

"What should they see? Why every thing the heart could desire."

"But still," said Rose-Pompon, more and more perplexed, "what am I required to give in return for all this?"

"Nothing at all!"

"Nothing?"

"Not so much even as this," said Nini-Moulin, biting the end of his nail.

"Well, then, if I am to give nothing, what shall I have to do?"

"Nothing in the world, but to look as pretty as possible, amuse yourself, and ride about in a carriage. So, you see, your duties will not be very fatiguing; added to which, you will have the satisfaction of knowing that you are assisting in a good action."

"By living like a duchess?"

"Yes; therefore pray do not ask me any further questions — for, indeed, I could not answer them if I would; besides, you will not be obliged to remain against your will—just try the life I propose to you ; if it suits you, continue it—if not, you will be at liberty to return to your Philemonic establishment whenever you please.”

“ That is fair enough ! ”

“ Well then, I say, try it. What do you risk by so doing ? ”

“ Nothing, certainly ; but I cannot persuade myself you are in earnest ; besides,” added she, hesitatingly, “ I scarcely know whether I ought.”

Nini-Moulin went to the window, opened it, and said to Rose-Pompon, who ran to see what he was looking at, “ What is that before the door of the house ? ”

“ A nice, pretty little carriage, upon my word. Oh dear ! oh dear ! how I should like to have just an hour’s ride in it ! ”

“ Well, then, you may have your wish as soon as you like, for that carriage is yours, and is there to await your orders.”

“ Waiting for me ? ” said Rose-Pompon ; “ why, must I make up my mind this very minute ? ”

“ Or refuse altogether.”

“ Must I positively give an answer to-day ? ”

“ This very minute.”

“ But where are going to take me ? ”

“ How should I know ? ”

“ Not know where you yourself are to conduct me ?—Nonsense ! ”

“ Indeed I do not ” (and again Dumoulin spoke the truth) ; “ the coachman has his orders.”

“ Now do you know all this is excessively droll, Nini-Moulin ? ”

“ I hope so—if it were not, where would be the pleasure ? ”

“ You are right.”

“ So, then, you mean to accept my offer—that’s well—I am delighted at it—both for your sake and my own.”

“ How for yours ? ”

“ Because by accepting what I propose, you will render me a great service.”

“ Render you a service ? How ?—in what manner ?—what sort of a service ? ”

“ Never mind how, provided you do serve and oblige me.”

“ Certainly ; then I don’t care about knowing how.”

“ Now then—shall we go ? ”

“ After all, why need I be afraid ?—they can’t eat me or drink me,” said Rose-Pompon, resolutely, as she skipped to a closet, and took from thence a pretty little pink cap, which she arranged before a cracked mirror, placing it so as to display her snow-white neck, with the silky roots of her glossy hair ; thus giving to her youthful features a look of archness almost amounting to pleasure-seeking joy. “ And now for my cloak,” said she to Nini-Moulin, who appeared wonderfully relieved since she had made up her mind to accept his proposition.

“ A cloak, indeed ! ” returned the cicisbeo, feeling for the last time in his last pocket—a regular wallet—from which he drew a magnificent cashmere shawl, which he placed on the shoulders of Rose-Pompon.

“ Good gracious me ! ” exclaimed the astonished girl, out of breath, with so joyful a surprise, — “what a love of a shawl! — a real, downright cashmere, I declare!” Then with an expression of countenance indicative of the heroic determination of her mind, she added, “I have decided; yes, I will run whatever risks are before me!” So saying, she lightly descended the stairs, followed by Nini-Moulin: the worthy dealer in fruit and charcoal was, as usual, in her shop.

“Good morning, mademoiselle,” said she to the young girl; “you are up betimes this morning.”

“Yes, so I am, Mother Arsène. Here is my key!”

“Thank you, mademoiselle.”

“Oh, my goodness!” said Rose-Pompon, turning quickly round to Nini-Moulin, and speaking in a low voice, drawing him, at the same time, to a distance from the portress; “but now I think of it! — Suppose Philemon —”

“Suppose what?”

“That he should return!”

“Oh, the d—l!” said Nini-Moulin, scratching his ear.

“Yes, what will Philemon say, I should like to know, if he arrives before I come back? Am I wanted for long?”

“You will be absent three or four months, I believe.”

“Not more?”

“I think not.”

“Oh, very well then,” said Rose-Pompon; then returning to the fruit-woman, she said, after a minute’s reflection, “Mother Arsène, if Philemon should arrive, tell him — I am gone out — upon business.”

“I will, mademoiselle.”

“And tell him to wait till I come back, and not to be fidgety.”

“I’ll be sure to say so, mademoiselle.”

“And desire him on no account to forget to feed my pigeons that are in his room.”

“I’ll not fail to give your message, mademoiselle.”

“Good-by, Mother Arsène.”

“Good-by, mademoiselle.”

And with these parting words, Rose-Pompon triumphantly ascended the carriage in company with Nini-Moulin.

“D—l take me,” said Jacques Dumoulin, “if I can guess what is to be the upshot of all this! However,” added he, as the carriage drove rapidly from the Rue Clovis, “I have made up for my late blunder, and now I care nothing for the rest of the affair.”

CHAPTER XLIII.

THE SECRET.

THE following scene occurred a few days after the carrying off of Rose-Pompon by Nini-Moulin.

Mademoiselle de Cardoville was seated, and in a deep reverie, in her private room, hung with green damask, and having an ebony book-case, relieved by tall caryatides of gilt metal.

By certain significant signs it was evident that Mademoiselle de Cardoville had sought, in the fine arts, for distraction from sorrowful and serious reflections. Near an open piano was a harp placed close to a music-stand. On a table, covered with boxes of crayons and sketches, were several sheets of drawing-paper, covered with highly-coloured sketches. The greater number were of Asiatic scenery, warmed with all the glow of an Eastern sun.

Faithful to her fancy for dressing herself when at home in a picturesque manner, Mademoiselle de Cardoville resembled, on this occasion, one of those haughty portraits of Velasquez, with their noble and aristocratic look. Her gown was of black watered silk, very full in the skirt, and very long in the waist, with slashed sleeves, puffed out with pink satin, embroidered with jet tags. A Spanish frill, very much starched, reached almost to her chin, and was confined round her neck by a red riband. This collar sloped gradually over the pink satin corsage laced with jet beads, and terminated in a point at the waist.

It is impossible to describe how perfectly this black dress, with its ample and bright folds, relieved by the pink and shining jet, harmonised with the dazzling whiteness of Adrienne's skin, and the golden hues of her beautiful hair, which fell in long and silky ringlets down to her waist.

The young girl was half-sitting, half-reclining on a causeuse, covered with green damask; the back of which was high towards the chimney, and gradually sloped down to the feet. A kind of light trellis of gilt metal, semicircular, about five feet high, was covered over with splendid passion-flowers, which were planted in a deep flower-box of ebony, whence the trellis proceeded, and thus covered the couch with a sort of screen of foliage and large flowers, green without and purple within, and looking as highly enamelled as those flowers which we see on the Saxony porcelain. A sweet and delicate perfume, like violets and jasmine mingling, was emitted from the corollæ of these splendid passiflores quadrangulosa.

It was strange to see the large quantity of new books (Adrienne had bought them two or three days before), only recently cut open, which were scattered about her, some on the causeuse, others on a small stand; and, amongst others, were large atlases, with engravings, lying on the splendid marten-skin carpet which was spread at the foot of the sofa. Still more strange, these books of different size and by different authors, all treated of the same subject.

Adrienne's posture revealed a sort of melancholy depression: her cheeks were pale, whilst a light and bluish ring round her half-closed black eyes gave them an expression of the deepest sadness.

Many motives conspired to cause this dejection, and, amongst others, was that of the disappearance of La Mayeux; without entirely believing the perfidious insinuations of Rodin, who implied, that in her fear of being unmasked by him, she had not dared to remain in the house, Adrienne still experienced a cruel and heartfelt pain when she reflected, that this young girl in whom she had had such faith had fled from her almost sisterly hospitality without leaving her one word of grateful adieu, for they had taken care not to shew to her benefactress the few lines which the poor sempstress had hastily written before she departed, and had only mentioned the note for 500 francs found in her bureau; and this fact, which was so inexplicable, had also contributed to excite most painful suspicions in the mind of Mademoiselle de Cardoville. She already experienced the sad effects of that mistrust of all and every thing which Rodin had counselled—that distrust and reserve becoming the more powerful as, for the first time in her life, Mademoiselle de Cardoville, until then a stranger to falsehood, had a secret to conceal—a secret which was at once her happiness, her shame, and her torment.

Half reclining on her divan, thoughtful and melancholy, Adrienne, frequently lost in reverie, turned over one of her newly purchased volumes, when suddenly she gave a slight shriek of surprise, the hand which held the book trembled like a leaf, and she began to read with passionate attention and with the most eager curiosity. Soon her eyes kindled with enthusiasm, her smile became ineffably sweet, and she seemed at once proud, happy, and delighted; but at the moment when she had turned over another page, her features expressed disappointment and vexation.

Then, again she recurred to that part which had caused her such delicious emotion; but this time she perused it with careful slowness, spelling, as it were, each page, and each line, and each word; then, from time to time, she paused, and then, pensively, with her brow bent and leaning on her lovely hand, she seemed to ponder in deepest reflection over the passages which she had just read with such tender and enthusiastic love. Arriving soon at a passage which so deeply impressed her, that a tear started in her eyes, she turned the volume suddenly to ascertain its author's name. For some seconds, she contemplated this name with an expression of singular gratitude, and at length pressed it to her vermilion lips. After having again and again read and re-read the lines which had so affected her, and then, no doubt forgetting the letter in the thought, she fell into a fit of musing so deep, that the volume slipped from her hand and fell on the floor.

During this reverie, the look of the young lady mechanically rested on a beautiful bas-relief, supported on an ebony easel, and placed near one of the windows.

The splendid bronze, recently cast from a plaster mould of the antique, represented the triumph of the Indian Bacchus, and never had the Grecian art attained higher perfection. The youthful conqueror, half clothed in a lion's skin, which did not conceal the juvenile purity and beauty of his limbs, bore the stamp of divinity, standing erect on a car drawn by two tigers, with an air at once mild and commanding. He leaned with one hand on a thyrsus, and with the other guided his savage team with tranquil majesty. By the rare mixture of grace, strength, and calmness, it was easy to recognise the hero who had so boldly contended with his fellow-men and the monsters of the forest.

The yellow tone of the light which was cast on this sculpture on one side brought out the figure of the youthful deity admirably; and as the relief was very high, thus lighted, it stood out like a splendid statue of pale gold from the dark and shaded bronze ground.

When Adrienne had first glanced at this rare combination of divine perfection, her features were calm and pensive, but her contemplation, at first almost mechanical, becoming more and more attentive and reflective, the young girl rose suddenly from her seat, and approaching slowly towards the bas-relief, appeared to be gradually impressed with the singular resemblance.

Then a light tint began to suffuse the cheeks of Mademoiselle de Cardoville, which gradually spread over her cheeks, brow, and neck. She approached nearer to the bas-relief, and after having cast around her a furtive glance, as though ashamed and fearing to be surprised in a guilty action, she twice raised her hand, trembling with emotion, in order to touch, with the tips of her rosy fingers, the forehead of the Indian Bacchus.

But twice, with a sort of modest hesitation, she paused. At last the temptation became too strong, and giving way to the impulse, she, with her alabaster finger, after having delicately caressed the pale, gold countenance of the young god, pressed somewhat more tardily, for a second, his noble and pure forehead.

At this pressure, light as it was, Adrienne seemed to undergo an electric shock, and trembled violently; her eyes half closed, and after having swam for an instant in their humid brilliancy, she raised them towards Heaven and closed them for an instant, as if they were weighed down by feeling; then her head fell back, her knees bent insensibly, her vermilion lips half opened to allow her warm breath to escape, and her bosom throbbed as if all the force of youth and life accelerated its beatings and impelled her blood; and then the burning countenance of Adrienne betrayed, in spite of herself, a sort of joy at once timid and impassioned, chaste and sensitive, whose expression was unutterably touching.

It is, in truth, unutterably touching to see a young virgin whose chaste brow first blushes with secret love. Does not the Creator of all things love the body of His creatures as well as the soul, His divine spark? Ought He not to be religiously glorified in the mind, as well as in the senses, with which He has so paternally gifted His creatures? Then they are impious blasphemers who seek to stifle divine sensations, instead of guiding and harmonising them with their heavenly source.

Suddenly Mademoiselle de Cardoville shuddered, raised her head, opened her eyes as if she were recovering from a dream, retreated quickly and left the bas-relief, and then made several turns in the apartment, greatly agitated, and holding her burning hands to her forehead.

Then falling, almost exhausted, on a seat, her tears flowed abundantly, bitter grief was depicted in her countenance, which thus revealed the fierce internal contest under which she was suffering.

Then her tears gradually dried, and to this crisis of agony succeeded a sort of violent anger, extreme indignation against herself, which might be guessed from the words that escaped her.

"For the first time in my life I feel that I am weak and cowardly — oh! yes, cowardly! — very cowardly!"

* * * * *

The noise of a door which opened and shut roused Mademoiselle de Cardoville from her painful reverie. Georgette entered, and said to her mistress, —

"Will mademoiselle receive M. le Comte de Montbron?"

Adrienne, knowing good taste too well to betray to her women any annoyance at a visit ill-timed, said to Georgette, —

"Did you say to M. de Montbron I was at home?"

"Yes, mademoiselle."

"Then pray ask him to come in."

Although Mademoiselle de Cardoville felt at this moment exceedingly annoyed at the arrival of M. de Montbron, yet we should say that she felt for him an affection that was almost filial, a high esteem, and at the same time, by a contrast which is however very common, she almost invariably found her opinion entirely opposed to his; and the consequence was, that when Mademoiselle de Cardoville had her mind perfectly free, discussions extremely gay and animated took place, in which, in spite of his vein of mockery and scepticism, his lengthened experience and profound knowledge of men and things, and (let us add) in spite of his rouerie de bonne compagnie, M. de Montbron had not always the best of the debate, and he acknowledged his defeat with the gayest good-humour. Thus, that we may give some idea of the disagreements between the count and Adrienne, he had, before he became, as he said, her accomplice, always opposed (from other motives than those alleged by Madame de Saint-Dizier) her desire to live alone and as she chose, whilst, on the contrary, Rodin, assigning to the motives of the young girl on this point a certain degree of greatness, had acquired a certain influence over her.

The Comte de Montbron, then turned sixty years of age, had been one of the most brilliant men of the Directory, the Consulate, and the Empire: his extravagance, his bons-mots, his wit, his duels, his loves, his losses at play, had constantly occupied the society of the age in which he lived. As to his disposition, his heart, and his habits, we will add, that he had continued always on terms of the closest friendship with all his old mistresses. At the time when we present him to the reader, he was still a high and a lucky player; he had, as they used to say, a very aristocratic look, a decided manner, yet clever and somewhat sarcastic; his habits were those of the best society, with a sort of impertinent raillery, when he did not like his company; he was very tall and thin, and still graceful in his figure, and moreover youthful; his forehead was high and bald; his hair white and short; his grey whisker cut en croissant; his face was long; his nose aquiline; his blue eyes were very penetrating; and his teeth still in excellent preservation.

"Monsieur le Comte de Montbron," said Georgette, opening the door.

The count entered and kissed Adrienne's hand with a kind of paternal familiarity.

"Now, then," said M. de Montbron to himself, "let us try and discover the truth I have come to learn, in order to prevent what may else perchance be a great calamity."

CHAPTER XLIV.

THE CONFESSION.

UNWILLING to expose the violence of the feelings by which she was agitated, Mademoiselle de Cardoville received M. de Montbron with a forced appearance of excessive gaiety, while he, on his part, spite of his perfect self-possession, found himself somewhat at a loss how to commence the subject he was desirous of discussing with Adrienne, and therefore resolved (as it is commonly called) to feel his way before entering upon the serious conversation he intended to hold with her. After looking fixedly at his fair companion for some seconds M. de Montbron shook his head, and said, with a half-mournful sigh,—

"My dear child, I do not feel perfectly happy."

"What is the matter with you, my dear count?" said Adrienne, smiling; "are you suffering from headache? or does Fortune frown just now?"

"Mine is, indeed, a pain in the heart!"

"Nay, nay, count! I cannot think it possible that the most skilful player in France should suffer more from the coolness of some adverse beauty, than he would experience were the dice unpropitious."

"Still, my dear child, I have a sore pain at my heart, and, stranger still, it is on your account."

"Upon my word, my lord," said Adrienne, laughing, "you will make me quite vain."

"Indeed, my child, I have no expectation that what I am about to say will in any way excite your vanity, for, in truth, I have to reproach you with neglecting your beauty. Look only at your pale, dejected, and careworn features, the melancholy which has hung about you for several days, I am sure—quite sure, all this has its origin in some secret source of grief."

"My dear M. de Montbron, your penetration is so justly acknowledged, that you may be fairly allowed to err for once in your judgment without its affecting your well-earned reputation; and certainly you are greatly mistaken in thinking me either sad or troubled with any secret sorrow; and if I durst venture to speak what I think without fear of being styled vain and conceited, I should say, I have never looked more captivating than I do at this present moment."

"And yet such is not your real opinion, but put into your head by some false and perfidious whisperer. Is this flattering friend a female?"

"No," replied Adrienne, with a slight emotion, "it was my own heart, which never deceives me!" Then added, "Understand—if you can."

"Do you mean by that to imply, that you rejoice in the difference your features present to what they did a few days ago, because you are proud of the internal suffering which preys upon you?" inquired M. de Montbron, examining Adrienne attentively. "In that case, then, I was right. You have some hidden grief. I am the more determined upon maintaining this assertion, because it affords me equal pain with yourself."

"Then, once for all, my kind friend, let me beseech you to banish such an idea from your mind, for it is impossible for any one to be more happy than myself. The simple thought that I am free—yes, at my age, wholly free and unfettered—is alone sufficient to preserve my beauty from fading or my spirits from failing."

"Yes, you are indeed free to torment yourself—free to be wretched how and in what manner you think fit."

"Come, come, dear count," said Adrienne, "we shall begin our old habit of disputing over again. I begin to find you out, and to set you down as the ally of my aunt and the Abbé d'Aigrigny."

"I? Yes, certainly; much after the fashion that the Republicans are the allies of the Legitimists, they affect to be on friendly terms the better to compass each other's destruction. But, à propos of your detestable aunt, I heard, that for the last few days a sort of conclave has been held at her house—that considerable agitation has been evinced by the various members of it—in fact, that it may be looked upon as a sort of peculiar commotion. Ah! your aunt is travelling a nice road!"

"What else can be expected from one whose life has presented such completely opposite tastes? There was a time when she was ambitious of enacting the part of the Goddess of Reason, now she seeks to be canonised as a saint. And wherefore should she not attain her wish, since she has well qualified herself to be admitted into the Saints' Calendar under the title of Saint Magdalen?"

"Say what you will of her, my dear child, it can never be more severe than she deserves; however, though certainly for very opposite reasons, I always was of her opinion as regarded your fancy for living alone."

"I know you were."

"And because I wish to see you a thousand times more free in every respect than you are at this moment, I advise you, faithfully and conscientiously——"

"To marry!"

"To be sure I would; and in that case, your dear liberty, with all its consequences, would belong, not to Mademoiselle de Cárdoville, but to Madame——whatever you please; for we should have found you an excellent husband, who would have been responsible for your independence."

"And pray," said Adrienne, smiling, "who would have been responsible for this contemptible husband? And what woman would degrade herself so far as to accept a name, laughed at and ridiculed by all? Not I, certainly!" continued the fair speaker, a little agitated. "No, no! my dear count; I alone will be answerable for my actions, whether right or wrong, and to my name shall be affixed the praise or blame of my words and opinions, for it would be as impossible to cast dishonour on the name of another as it would be for me to bear that name, unless it were surrounded with universal respect and esteem. Now, as I can answer for my own determination, never, by word or thought, to sully the name I received from my ancestors, and cannot possibly undertake for my husband (had I one) being equally tenacious of the purity of his, why, I prefer to remain as I am—Adrienne de Cardoville."

"No living creature ever indulged in such ideas!"

"You say so," answered Adrienne, smiling, "because I object to the sight of a poor young girl being tied for life to some disagreeable, selfish individual—to barter her youth, her smiles, her freshness, for the dull privilege of being called his better half—ah! the very notion makes me feel pettish. As well might a charming rose be obliged to become the better half of an ugly thistle! Come, come, dear count," said Adrienne, bursting into a laugh, "you must confess there is nothing very tempting in this conjugal metempsychosis!"

The false gaiety and feverish excitement of Adrienne contrasted so strikingly with the paleness and suffering depicted in her countenance, it was so easy to perceive that all these forced spirits were merely intended to drown some internal grief, that M. de Montbron found himself deeply touched by the melancholy sight. Still concealing his emotion, he appeared, for a short space, to be deeply reflecting, and mechanically took up one of the books recently purchased and cut open, by which Adrienne was surrounded. After casting a hasty glance over it, he said, while striving to dissimulate the painful ideas awakened by the forced mirth of Mademoiselle de Cardoville,—

"You terrible madcap! Well, let us have one more attempt to prove my case. Suppose, now, that I were only twenty years of age, and that you were to do me the honour of espousing me, you would then be styled Madame de Montbron, I suppose?"

"Perhaps I should."

"How do you mean perhaps? Why, if you were my wife, do you mean to say you would not bear my name?"

"My dear count," replied Adrienne, smiling sweetly, "cease to pursue an hypothesis which leaves me only regrets!"

All at once M. de Montbron made a sudden start, and surveyed Mademoiselle de Cardoville with an expression of profound surprise. During his conversation with Adrienne, the count had mechanically taken up the different volumes scattered about on the sofa on which they were both seated, and, with an equally natural action, had vaguely cast his eyes over their contents. The first book he opened bore for its title, "Modern History of India;" the second, "Travels in India;" the third, "Letters on India." More and more surprised, M. de Montbron continued his investigation, and found this Indian nomenclature followed up by the fourth volume, "Excursions in India;"

the fifth, "Remembrances of India;" the sixth, "Notes of a Traveller to the East Indies."

From hence arose an astonishment so great, and for several reasons so profoundly agitating, that M. de Montbron found it impossible to conceal from the penetrating eyes of Mademoiselle de Cardoville how deeply it affected him.

Adrienne, however, having totally forgotten the presence of the accusing volumes by which she was surrounded, and instigated by an involuntary feeling of petulance, blushed somewhat in displeasure at the fixed gaze with which her companion seemed trying to read her innermost thoughts; then, resuming the usual frankness of her manner, she, in her turn, looked steadily in the face of M. de Montbron, and said, in the most natural manner possible,—

"My dear count, what have you found to astonish you so greatly?"

But, instead of a direct reply to her question, the count appeared even more absorbed and earnest than before, while still contemplating the fair girl, he murmured forth, as if speaking to himself,—

"No, no; it cannot be—it is impossible!—and yet ——"

"Would there be any objection to my knowing the subject of your monologue, my dear count?" said Adrienne, with a merry laugh.

"I beg your pardon, my child; but, in truth, my surprise has been too much for me at seeing ——"

"Seeing what I pray?"

"Such evident marks of your all-absorbing interest in whatever appertains to India," said M. de Montbron, slowly pronouncing his words, and fixing a penetrating glance on the features of Adrienne as he uttered them.

"Well, and what do you infer from that?" inquired Adrienne, boldly.

"I infer nothing; but I am lost in conjectures as to the cause of this sudden passion for matters you have hitherto cared nothing for."

"Oh, you wonder I should have so geographical a taste, and probably think it too grave a study for one of my age! but then, you know, my dear count, one must have some pursuit for our leisure hours; and besides, since I have been aware of my relationship to the half-civilised Indian who writes himself my cousin and a petty prince, I have felt some curiosity to obtain an idea of the fortunate land which gave birth to my interesting, though savage protégé."

These latter words were spoken with a bitterness that struck M. de Montbron forcibly, still, therefore, continuing attentively to watch the expression of Adrienne's features, he merely replied,—

"You appear to express yourself somewhat severely as regards the prince."

"Not at all; I speak with the utmost indifference."

"And yet he is deserving of a very different sentiment."

"Probably," answered Adrienne, coldly, "but it must be from a person of very different ideas to my own."

"He is so wretched," said M. de Montbron, in a tone of unfeigned sympathy; "I saw him two days ago, and really it grieved me to the heart to witness his misery!"

"And what have I to do with his sufferings?" exclaimed Adrienne, in a voice of painful impatience, almost amounting to anger.

"I should wish you, at least, to pity the torments he endures," replied the count, with a serious manner.

"Pity, and from me!" exclaimed Adrienne, with a look of offended pride; then, repressing her emotion, she said, coldly, "You are jesting, no doubt, M. de Montbron, when you ask me to take an interest in the love-sick torments of your pet prince?"

These last words of Adrienne were pronounced with a manner so freezingly contemptuous, while her pale and painfully contracted features betrayed so bitter a pride, that M. de Montbron said sorrowfully,—

"It is then true—too true! and I have not been deceived, I who fancied that, from long years of faithful friendship, I had some claims on your confidence, have been kept in the dark, while you have unbosomed yourself to another,—this, I must confess, pains me deeply—severely!"

"I do not understand you, M. de Montbron."

"It is useless," continued the count, carried away by the violence of his feelings, "to employ any further concealment. I see, but too plainly, that there is no hope left for my poor boy—you love another!" And, seeing Adrienne start as if taken by surprise, he continued, "Yes, yes; it is evidently so; your paleness, your melancholy for several days past, your invincible indifference to all that concerns the prince, abundantly prove that you love ——"

Offended at the manner in which the count assumed a knowledge of her heart, she replied, with proud dignity,—

"You are doubtless aware, M. de Montbron, that a secret surprised is not a confidence, and, I must further add, that your language greatly astonishes me."

"But, my dear girl, if I use the sad privilege of experience, if I divine, if I venture openly to speak of the state of your heart, if I even go so far as to find fault with you, for having bestowed your affections, it is because the life or death of that poor young prince, whom you know I love and cherish as fondly as though he were my son, is involved in the matter. No one can be acquainted with my interesting protégé, without feeling the most tender concern in all that refers to him; and from my heart I wish it had been otherwise, as regards the state of your affections!"

"It would be strange indeed," replied Adrienne, with increased coldness, mingled with bitter irony, "if the bestowal of my love (even admitting that my heart entertained such a feeling) should have so strange an influence on Prince Djalma! What can it import to him whom I love?" added she, with a sort of disdain that was almost painful to witness.

"What does it matter to him?" rejoined the astonished count. "My dearest child, you must permit me to say that 'tis you who indulge in jests far too cruel! Why, when the wretched youth, loving you with all the wild ardour of a first passion, has been driven by despair twice to seek in death a termination to the torments he has undergone on your account, you appear astonished that the fact of your loving another should become with him a question of life or death."

"Does he, then, love me?" asked the trembling girl, in a tone and manner impossible to describe.

"Does he? ay, better than a hundred lives. I can answer for it; I have witnessed it."

Adrienne appeared almost stupified at these words; a bright rush of blood suffused her before so pale countenance, then, quickly receding, left her paler than before, while her pale lips trembled as though with words she sought in vain to speak; then, placing her hand against her heart, she appeared as though essaying to stay its throbbing.

Terrified at the rapid change in the features of Adrienne, as well as at her alarming agitation, M. de Montbron approached her hastily, saying, "For Heaven's sake, my child, what is the matter?"

But, instead of making any reply, she merely waved her hand, as though to allay his fears, and soon, indeed, the apprehensions of the count were set at rest, for the lovely countenance which had been a few minutes before contracted by disdain, irony, and grief, appeared suddenly lit up by the softest, sweetest emotions; the sensations she experienced were so ineffably delicious that it seemed as though she were unwilling to break the blessed spell by pronouncing a single word; then suddenly came the distressing suggestion that she might still be under the influence of some illusion or deceit, and, addressing M. de Montbron, she exclaimed, in a voice of agony,—

"But you—you are not deceiving me—'tis true he loves me—is it not? Oh, speak and say so!"

"What I tell you?"

"Yes, yes—that Prince Djalma——"

"Loves you to distraction. Alas! 'tis but too true."

"No, no!" cried Adrienne, with the most enchanting simplicity, "it cannot be too true!"

"How?" exclaimed the count.

"But this female?" inquired Adrienne, as though the very question scorched her lips.

"What female?"

"She who was the cause of all his suffering."

"My child, I know of no other than yourself!"

"I?—oh, say that again—say it was I only who occasioned all the agony the prince endured!"

"My beloved child, have confidence in me when I assure you that the prince has never felt a sigh for any one but yourself, and never have I witnessed a more sincere or touching passion."

"'Tis then true—his heart has never loved another than myself? Oh, say I am right!—speak, dear friend!"

"You are, indeed;—you, and you alone, are the object of his soul's idolatry."

"Yet I was told——"

"By whom?"

"By M. Rodin."

"That Djalma——"

"That two days after our meeting, the prince had fallen desperately in love with another, and that other utterly unworthy of him."

"M. Rodin told you so?" cried M. de Montbron, as though struck with some sudden idea; "why, he it was who plunged a dagger in the heart of Djalma, by telling him that you were passionately in love with another."

THE CONFESSION.

"I?"

"Which threw the unhappy prince into the state of despair I have described."

"And it was my distress at learning that Djalma's love was not for me that produced the grief and melancholy you observed in me."

"But it seems that you return his passion even as warmly as he loves you," exclaimed M. de Montbron, in a transport of joy.

"Oh, do I not!" responded Mademoiselle de Cardoville, clasping her hands in a paroxysm of delight.

Some gentle taps at the door here interrupted Adrienne.

"Some of the servants, doubtless," said the count; "strive to collect yourself."

"Come in," said Adrienne, in a voice that betrayed her deep emotion.

Florine appeared.

"What is it?" inquired her mistress.

"M. Rodin has just been, but, fearing to disturb you, madam, he would not come in, but left word he would return in half-an-hour; will it be agreeable to you to receive him?"

"Yes, yes," said the count, to Florine; "and though I should still be with your young lady, shew him in all the same. Shall it not be so?" inquired M. de Montbron, of Adrienne.

"Certainly," replied the happy girl, a gleam of indignation sparkling in her eyes at the recollection of Rodin's perfidy.

"The old villain!" exclaimed M. de Montbron, "I always suspected his stiff, starched, hypocritical demeanour; but he is now unmasked."

Florine quitted the room, leaving her mistress alone with M. de Montbron.

CHAPTER XLV.

LOVE.

MADemoiselle DE CARDOVILLE's countenance was quite altered. For the first time her beauty shone forth in all its lustre, until now veiled by indifference or depressed by grief, a dazzling sunbeam suddenly lighted it up.

The slight irritation caused by Rodin's perfidy had passed like an imperceptible shadow across the young maiden's brow. Of what import were now these falsehoods—these treacheries? Were they not now unveiled?

And for the future, what human power could come between herself and Djalma, now so sure of each other? Who would dare to struggle against these two beings, so resolute and strong in the irresistible potency of their youth, love, and liberty? Who would dare to follow them into that warm sphere in which they, so handsome, so happy, were about to be united in lasting love, protected and defended by their happiness, an armour that was proof against all attacks?

Florine had scarcely gone out than Adrienne approached M. de Montbron with a rapid step. She seemed taller as she advanced, light, triumphant, and glowing. She was, indeed, a divinity walking on the clouds.

"When shall I see him?"

This was her first word to M. de Montbron.

"Why, to-morrow; he must be prepared for so much happiness: a sudden and unexpected joy may be too terrible to a disposition so ardent."

Adrienne remained for a moment pensive; then she said suddenly,—

"To-morrow—yes—not before to-morrow; I have a superstitious feeling in my heart."

"What is it?"

"You shall know. HE LOVES ME. This word expresses, includes every thing—comprises all, is all; and I have a thousand questions on my lips in reference to him, still; I will not ask one before to-morrow. No! because, by a revered fatality, to-morrow is a sacred anniversary. From now till then I shall live an age; but I can wait. Look here!"

Then making a sign to M. de Montbron, she led him towards the Indian Bacchus.

"What a strong likeness!" she observed to the count.

"In truth," he said, "it is strange."

"Strange?" replied Adrienne, smiling,— "strange that a hero—that a demigod—that an ideal of beauty should resemble Djalma?"

"How you love him!" said Montbron, deeply moved, and almost dazzled at the happiness which shone in Adrienne's countenance.

"I must have suffered a good deal; must I not?" she said, after a moment's silence.

"If I had not decided on coming here to-day without any assignable reason, what would have happened?"

"I do not know,—I should have died, perhaps, for I am smitten here (and she put her hand upon her heart) incurably. But what would have been my death will now be my life."

"Horrible to think of!" said the count, with a shudder; "a passion concentrated like yours, and as proud as you are —"

"Yes, proud, but not disdainful; and thus on learning his love for another, and learning that the impression which I believed I had made on him at our first meeting was instantly effaced, I had renounced all hope without being able to renounce my love; and instead of flying from my memory, I surrounded myself with all that could recall it. When happiness is lost, there is still a bitter joy in suffering from those we love."

"I can now understand your Indian library."

Adrienne, without any reply, went to the stand, whence she took one of the newly cut open books with an expression of joy and happiness.

"Yes, I am very proud! Look, read that! read it aloud, I beg of you. I repeat, I can wait until to-morrow."

And with the tip of her beautiful finger she pointed out a passage to the count in the book, which she presented to him.

She then went and, as it were, concealed herself on her causeuse; and then, in an attitude profoundly attentive and listening, with her body leaning forwards, and her hands crossed on the cushion, her chin leaning on her hand, her large eyes fixed with a kind of admiration on the Indian Bacchus in front of her, she seemed, in this impassioned depth of contemplation, to prepare to listen to M. de Montbron's reading.

He, very much surprised, began, after having looked at Adrienne, who said to him, in the softest and sweetest tone possible, "And very slowly, I entreat of you."

M. de Montbron read the following extract from the journal of a traveller in India,—

"When I was in India, at Bombay, in 1829, they were talking in all English societies of a young hero, son of——"

The count paused for a second at the barbarous pronunciation of the name of Djalma's father, Adrienne said quickly, in a soft tone, "Son of Kadja-Sing."

"What a memory!" said the count, with a smile.

And he continued,—

"A young hero, son of Kadja-Sing, King of Mundi, on his return from a distant and bloody expedition in the mountains against this Indian king, Colonel Drake was full of enthusiasm and respect to this son of Kadja-Sing, called Djalma. Hardly out of boyhood, this young prince, in a deadly war, displayed such chivalric intrepidity, such a noble character, that they surnamed his father the Father of the Generous."

"How very touching," said the count, "is the custom of thus recompensing the sire in giving him a surname glorious for the son—it is noble! But how singular that you should fall in with this book!" added the count, with surprise; "I can easily comprehend that it is enough to excite even the coldest brain."

"Oh, you will see—you will see!" said Adrienne.

The count continued reading,—

"Colonel Drake, one of the bravest and best soldiers in the British army, told me yesterday that being dangerously wounded and taken prisoner by Prince Djalma, after a desperate resistance, he had been taken to the camp, which was in the village of——"

Here the same hesitation came over the count at meeting with a name even more difficult than the former; and not willing to make the attempt even to pronounce it, he interrupted himself, and said to Adrienne,—

"Ah, as for this, I must really give it up!"

"And yet it is very easy," replied Adrienne; and with inexpressible sweetness she pronounced the following name, which is, really, very soft, "In the village of Shumshabad."

"This is an infallible mnemonic process for remembering geographical names," said the count. And he continued,—

"Once arrived at the camp Colonel Drake received the most kind hospitality, and Prince Djalma watched over him like a son. It was then that the colonel became acquainted with certain facts, which raised his enthusiasm for Prince Djalma to the highest pitch. He related to me the following circumstances.

“‘In one of the battles the prince was attended by a young Indian, about twelve years of age, to whom he was tenderly attached, and who was his page; following him on horseback, bearing his spare weapons. This boy was idolised by his mother, who, at the moment when the expedition set out, had confided her boy to Prince Djalma, saying to him, with a stoicism worthy of antiquity, ‘Let him be your brother!’ ‘He shall be my brother!’ was the prince’s reply. In the midst of a sanguinary rout the child was severely wounded, and his horse was killed. The prince, at the peril of his life, and in spite of the hurry of a precipitate retreat, rescued him, took him up behind him, and then dashed off; they were pursued, and their horse wounded, but still he struggled on to a clump of jungles, in the midst of which, after several vain efforts, he fell exhausted. The child was incapable of proceeding, and the prince taking him up in his arms, plunged with him into the thickest of the jungle. The English came up and searched the thicket, but the two escaped. After walking for a day and a night with forced march, counter-marches, stratagems, fatigues, and unheard-of perils, the prince still carrying the child, one of whose legs was severely injured, reached the camp of his father, when he only said, ‘I promised his mother that he should be my brother, and I have acted as a brother.’”

“It is admirable!” exclaimed the count.

“Continue, pray continue,” said Adrienne, dropping a tear, without taking her eyes from the bas-relief which she continued to contemplate with increasing love.

The count read on,— “‘Another time Prince Djalma, followed by two black slaves, went before sunrise to a very wild spot to carry off two small tigers only a few days old. The den had been marked, the tiger and his mate were absent in search of food. One of the blacks entered the den by a narrow opening, the other, with Djalma’s aid, cut down with an axe a large trunk of a tree, in order to form a snare to take the tiger or his mate. On this side of the mouth the cave was almost perpendicular. The prince climbed up with agility, in order to lay the snare, with the help of the other black, when suddenly a frightful roaring was heard, and in half-a-dozen bounds, the female, returning from her quest, reached the aperture of the den. The black who was laying the snare with the prince had his skull laid open by a bite; the tree fell across the narrow entrance of the cave, preventing the dam from entering, and at the same time barring the egress of the black, who was running out with the little cubs. Above, about twenty feet higher, on a platform formed by rocks, the prince, lying on his stomach, saw the fearful spectacle. The tigress, rendered furious by the cries of her young, was gnawing the black’s hands, who, from the inside of the den, was endeavouring to keep hold of the trunk of the tree, which was his sole rampart, and was uttering dreadful cries.’”

“It is horrible, indeed!” said the count.

“Oh, go on—go on!” exclaimed Adrienne, with excitement; “you will see what the heroism of goodness can do.”

The count proceeded :—

“ ‘ Suddenly the prince took his poniard between his teeth, tied his waist-belt to a point of the rock, took his hatchet in his hands, and with the other descended by the scarf, and alighted some paces from her, and, rapid as lightning, gave her two deadly stabs at the moment when the black, losing his strength, had let go the tree, and must have been torn to pieces.’ ”

“ And you are astonished at the resemblance with this demi-god, to whom even fable does not assign a devotion equally generous ! ” exclaimed the young girl, with increasing excitement.

“ I am no longer surprised — I admire,” said the count, with a voice of emotion ; “ and at these two noble traits my heart beats with enthusiasm as if I were but twenty years old.”

“ And the noble heart of this traveller beats like yours at the recital,” said Adrienne, “ as you will see.”

“ ‘ What makes the intrepidity of the prince the more admirable is, that, according to the principles of the Indian castes, a slave’s life is of no importance : thus a king’s son risking his life to preserve a poor creature so low in estimation, obeyed an heroic instinct of charity that was truly Christian, and hitherto unheard of in this country. Two such traits, as Colonel Drake very justly observed, are enough to depict the man, and it is with a sentiment of deep respect and extreme admiration, I, an unknown traveller, have written Prince Djalma’s name in my book of travels, experiencing at the same time a sort of sorrow, when I ask myself what will be the future fate of this prince, lost in the depths of this wild country, now wholly devastated by war. How humble soever may be the tribute I pay to a character worthy of the heroic times, his name, at least, shall be repeated with generous enthusiasm by all hearts that can sympathise with what is generous and great.’ ”

“ When I read these lines, so simple and so touching,” replied Adrienne, “ I could not help carrying the book to my lips.”

“ Yes, he is all I thought him,” said the count, more and more moved, and returning the book to Adrienne, who rose gravely, and also much affected, said to him,—

“ He is such as I would have you know him, in order that you may appreciate my adoration for him — for this courage, this heroic goodness, I had guessed from a conversation which I overheard, in spite of myself, before I appeared in his apartment. From that time I knew him to be as generous as he was brave, as tender, as exquisitely sensitive, as energetic and resolute ; but when I saw him so gloriously handsome, and so different, by the noble expression of his countenance, and even in his attire, from all I had ever before met with, — when I saw the impression which I made upon him, and which, perhaps, I experienced even more powerfully, I felt my life itself was bound up in this love.”

“ And what are now your plans ? ”

“ Divine — as radiant as my heart. When he learns his happiness, I wish Djalma to experience the same bewilderment as I am smitten with, and which will not allow me yet to look my sun in the face — for I repeat to you, from hence till to-morrow will be an age to live ! Yes, strange as it may appear, I had believed, after such a revelation, that I should have felt the want of remaining alone plunged in an ocean of overwhelming thoughts. But no, no; from now till to-morrow, I dread my solitude; I feel an indescribable, feverish, disturbed, burning impatience! Oh! blessed be the fairy who, touching me with her wand, will put me to sleep from now till to-morrow!"

"I will be that benevolent fairy," said the count, smiling.

"You?"

"I."

"And in what way?"

"Behold the power of my wand. I wish to distract you from a portion of your thoughts, by making them materially visible to you."

"Pray thee explain."

"And moreover, my plan will have an additional advantage. Hear me: you are so happy, that you can listen to any thing,—your odious aunt and her odious friends give out that your residence with Dr. Baleinier ——"

"Was rendered necessary from my weakness of mind," said Adrienne, with a smile. "I expected that."

"Stupid as it is: but as your resolution to live alone creates you those who envy and hate you, you know wherefore there will not be wanting persons fully disposed to credit all that is said, however stupid."

"I hope so. To be taken for mad by fools, is very flattering."

"Yes; but to prove to fools that they are fools, and that in the face of all Paris, is very amusing; and they are beginning to be uneasy at not seeing you. You have discontinued your usual drives out; my niece has been alone for a long time in our box at the Italian theatre. You wish to destroy, consume time until to-morrow, and now there is an excellent opportunity: it is two o'clock — at half-past three my niece will call here in her carriage; it is a lovely day, and the Bois de Boulogne will be crowded; you will have a delightful ride, and see all the world: then the air and locomotion will calm your fevered happiness, and this evening (now my magic begins), I will take you to India ——"

"To India?"

"In the midst of one of those wild forests wherein we hear lions, panthers, and tigers roar. The heroic combat which just now so much excited you, shall pass, fierce and terrible, beneath your eyes."

"Really, my dear count, this is a very pleasant jest."

"Not at all. I promise to shew you real wild beasts, the redoubtable dwellers in the land of your demi-god—growling tigers—roaring lions. Is not that better than your books?"

"But really ——"

"Come, I see I must let you into the secret of my supernatural power. On your return from your drive, you shall dine with my niece, and we will go afterwards to see a very singular spectacle at the Porte-Saint-Martin, a most wonderful tamer of wild beasts there exhibits animals perfectly ferocious in the midst of a forest (now the illusion begins), and feigns with them, tigers, lions, and panthers, the most desperate combats. All Paris runs after these representations, and all Paris will see you there, more lovely, more charming than ever."

"Agreed, agreed," said Adrienne, with childish delight. "Yes, you are right; I shall experience a singular pleasure in seeing these fierce monsters, who will remind me of those my demigod so heroically fought. I agree, moreover, because for the first time in my life I ardently desire to be thought very handsome by all the world. I agree because ——"

Mademoiselle de Cardoville was interrupted by a slight tap at the door, and then Florine entered to announce M. Rodin.

CHAPTER XLVI.

EXECUTION.

RODIN entered: a rapid glance cast on Mademoiselle de Cardoville and M. de Montbron at once convinced him that he was in a difficult position. In truth, nothing could be less satisfactory to him than the looks of Adrienne and the count.

The latter, when he did not like a person, manifested, as we have already said, his antipathy by certain modes of aggressive impertinences, which had been, by the way, answered for and maintained in several duels; and now, at the sight of Rodin, his features suddenly assumed a contemptuous and harsh expression, and leaning his elbow on the mantel-piece as he conversed with Adrienne, he turned his head haughtily over his shoulder without taking any notice of the low bow of the Jesuit.

At the sight of this man, Mademoiselle de Cardoville felt herself almost surprised at not experiencing any feeling of irritation or hatred. The brilliant flame which was kindled in her bosom purified her heart from all feelings of vengeance. She smiled, on the contrary, for, casting a proud but tender look on the Indian Bacchus, and then at herself, she asked herself whether two beings so young, so handsome, so free, and so fond, could have, at this moment, any thing to fear from this dirty old man, with mean and servile air, who approached her so crawlingly, like a wriggling reptile. In fact, far from feeling anger with or aversion to Rodin, the young lady experienced only an increase of gay raillery, and her large eyes, already bright with bliss, now sparkled with malicious irony.

Rodin felt very ill at ease. The persons of his gown infinitely prefer violent enemies to mocking adversaries; sometimes escaping the ire loosened against them by falling on their knees, weeping, and groaning, and beating the breast; and sometimes, on the other hand, braving them audaciously, and shewing an armed and implacable front — but before the biting satire they are soon disconcerted, and so was Rodin at this moment, who felt that, placed between Adrienne de Cardoville and M. de Montbron, he was about to pass what is vulgarly termed a rather uncomfortable quarter of an hour.

The count opened the fire, and looking over his shoulder, he said to Rodin, —

"Ah — ah, here you are, Mr. Benevolence!"

"Come nearer, sir; come nearer, sir," said Adrienne, with a satirical smile,—"you, the pearl of friends, the model of philosophers—you, the declared foe of all roguery, all falsehood, I have a thousand compliments prepared for you."

"I accept every thing from you, my dear young lady, even unmerited compliments," said the Jesuit, forcing a smile, and exposing thereby his horrid yellow and carious teeth; "but may I inquire how I have deserved these compliments?"

"Your penetration is usually very keen, sir," replied Adrienne.

"And I, sir," said the count, "I pay homage to your veracity, not less evident, or, perhaps, too evident."

"I penetrating—and in what, my dear young lady?" asked Rodin, with composure. "I veracious, and in what, Monsieur le Comte?" he added, turning round to M. de Montbron.

"In what, sir?" said Adrienne; "why you have guessed a secret surrounded by difficulties and mysteries without number—in a word, you have contrived to read the very bottom of a woman's heart."

"I, my dear young lady?"

"You, sir, and you have cause to rejoice—your penetration has produced the most happy results."

"And your veracity effected wonders," added the count.

"It is pleasant to the heart to act well even without knowing it," said Rodin, still keeping on the defensive, and looking askance at the count and Adrienne in turns; "but may I know for what I am now commended?"

"Gratitude compels me to inform you, sir," said Adrienne, satirically, "you have discovered, and disclosed to Prince Djalma, that I am passionately in love with some one. Well! laud your penetration—it is true!"

"You have discovered, and disclosed to mademoiselle, that the Prince Djalma was passionately in love with some one. Well! laud your veracity, my dear sir—it is true!"

Rodin was thunderstruck and silent.

"The some one whom I loved so passionately," said Adrienne, "is the prince."

"The some one whom the prince loves so passionately," added the count, "is mademoiselle."

These disclosures, so seriously disquieting, and made so unexpectedly, overwhelmed Rodin, who stood mute and alarmed as he reflected on the future.

"Can you now comprehend our gratitude towards you, sir?" said Adrienne, in a tone still more ironical. "Thanks to your sagacity, thanks to the deep interest you bear us, we, the prince and I, are indebted to you for being enlightened in our mutual sentiments towards each other."

The Jesuit resumed his sang froid; and his assumed composure greatly annoyed M. de Montbron, who, but for Adrienne's presence, would have given quite another turn to the proceeding.

"There is some error," said Rodin, "in what you, my dear young lady, have done me the honour to communicate to me. Never in my life have I said a word in reference to the most suitable and, in every way, proper sentiment you entertain for Prince Djalma."

"Most true," interposed Adrienne; "and by a scruple of most exquisite discretion, when you were speaking to me of the intense love which the Prince Djalma experienced, you carried your reserve, your delicacy to such a pitch, as to say, that it was not me whom he loved."

"And the same scruple made you say to the prince that Made-moiselle de Cardoville was in love with some one, and that some one was not him."

"Monsieur le Comte," said Rodin, dryly, "I have no occasion to tell you, that I feel no particular inclination for mixing myself up in love-affairs."

"Really—what modesty or self-love!" said the count, rudely. "For your interest's sake, I pray you do not avow any such bad taste, for it might injure you if it were made public. You must, assuredly, be more careful with regard to the other small occupations you no doubt attend to."

"There is one, sir, at least," said Rodin, becoming as insulting as M. de Montbron himself, "for whose rude apprenticeship I am indebted to you, Monsieur le Comte, and that is the onerous occupation of being your auditor."

"Ah! dear sir!" retorted the count, disdainfully, "were you not aware that there are many ways of chastising rogues and impertinent fellows?"

"My dear count!" said Adrienne to M. de Montbron in a tone of reproach.

Rodin replied with the utmost composure,—

"I really do not see, M. le Comte, primo, that there is much courage in threatening and calling impertinent a poor old fellow like myself; secundo —"

"M. Rodin," said the count, interrupting the Jesuit, "primo, a poor old fellow like you, who behaves shamefully, and then ensconces himself behind the old age which he dishonours, is at once a coward and a scoundrel, and deserves a double chastisement. Secundo, as to age, I do not know that hunters and gensdarmes bow with any respect before the grey hide of old wolves, or the grey hairs of old knaves—what think you, cher monsieur?"

Rodin still unmoved, elevated his shrivelled eyelid, fixed for a moment his little reptile eye upon the count, darted at him a glance as chill and sharp as a dart, then the livid lid again fell in the dull eyeball of the corpse-faced old man.

"Not being an old wolf, and still less an old knave," replied Rodin, quietly, "you will allow me, M. le Comte, not to disturb myself unnecessarily as to the pursuits of wolf-hunters or gensdarmes; as to the reproaches made to me, I have a very simple mode of reply, I do not say justification, for I never justify myself."

"Indeed!" said the count.

"Never!" replied Rodin, with perfect coolness; "my actions must do that for me. I shall therefore simply reply, that seeing the deep, violent, and really fearful impression caused on the prince by made-moiselle —"

"Let the assurance you now give me of the prince's love," said Adrienne, with an enchanting smile, and interrupting Rodin, "absolve you of the ill you sought to do me. The sight of our coming happiness shall be your sole punishment."

"It may chance that I have neither need of absolution nor of punishment, for as I have had the honour to observe, my dear young lady, the future will justify my acts. Yes, I thought it right to say to the prince that you loved another person, and that person not himself, as I thought it also right to tell you that the prince loved another person, and that person was not yourself; and I believed, and believe, I was acting for your mutual interest. My attachment to you may have misled me, possibly so; but after my past conduct to you, my dear young lady, I think I have a right to feel surprised at being thus treated. This is not a complaint; for if I never justify myself, still less do I ever complain."

"Parbleu! you grow heroic, my dear sir!" said the count. "You neither deign to complain, nor justify the ill you do."

"The ill I do?" and Rodin fixed his eyes steadfastly on the count. "Are we playing at riddles to-day?"

"What do you mean, sir?" exclaimed the count, with great indignation; "and what do you call it, when, by your falsehoods, you have plunged the prince into such fearful despair that he has twice attempted his life? What do you call it, when, by your falsehoods, you threw mademoiselle into so cruel and entire a mistake, that, but for the resolution I have taken to-day, this error would still have existed, and might have had the most fatal results?"

"And will you do me the honour, M. le Comte, to tell me what interest have I in these despairs, these errors, admitting for a moment that I have caused them?"

"A deep interest, unquestionably," said the count, sternly; "and the more dangerous, inasmuch as it is concealed; for you are of that number, I easily perceive, to whom the misfortunes and injuries of others bring both pleasure and profit."

"That would be too much, M. le Comte. I would content myself with the profit," said Rodin, with a bow.

"Your insolent coolness does not deceive me. This becomes very serious," continued the count; "it is unlikely that this perfidy is a solitary act. Who knows if this be not also one of the effects of Madame de Saint-Dizier's hatred to Mademoiselle de Cardoville?"

Adrienne had listened to this discussion with deep attention. Suddenly she started as if enlightened by a sudden revelation.

After a moment's silence, she said to Rodin, without severity, without anger, but with calmness, full of softness and serenity,—

"They say, sir, that happy love effects prodigies. I should be inclined to believe it, for after some minutes' reflection, during which I have recalled certain circumstances, your whole conduct appears to me under a fresh aspect."

"What may be this new perspective, my dear young lady?"

"That you may have my view of the case, sir, allow me to recall a few facts. La Mayeux was utterly devoted to me, and had given me undeniable proofs of her attachment; her mind was worthy of her noble heart, but she felt towards you an invincible antipathy. All at once she disappears mysteriously from my house, and it has not been your fault that I have not entertained the most hateful suspicions of her. M. de Montbron has a paternal affection for me, but, I must own, very little sympathy towards you, and you have endeavoured to create a coolness between us. Then the Prince Djalma experiences a deep feeling for me, and you employ the most treacherous deceit to destroy that sentiment—what is your motive? I do not, cannot divine; but I am persuaded it is inimical to me.”

“It would seem, mademoiselle,” said Rodin, sternly, “that you add the forgetfulness of services rendered to your inability to explain my conduct.”

“I will not deny, sir, that you released me from M. Baleinier’s house; but then, in fact, in a few days more I should most certainly have been freed by M. de Montbron.”

“You are right, my dear girl,” said the count; “it is more than probable that he desired to acquire the merit of what must soon have inevitably accrued, thanks to your best of friends.”

“You were drowning, I save you—you are grateful to me? a mistake!” said Rodin, bitterly; “another passer-by would, doubtless, have saved you at a later period.”

“The comparison is hardly correct,” said Adrienne, with a smile; “a maison de santé is not a river; and, although I now think you, sir, a very likely person to swim between two streams, swimming was useless in this instance, and you only opened a door to me which must infallibly have been opened very soon.”

“Capital! my dear child!” said the count, laughing heartily at Adrienne’s reply.

“I know, sir, that your remarkable attentions are not confined to me alone. Marshal Simon’s daughters were brought back to him by you, but who could credit that the researches and claims of the Maréchal, Duc de Ligny, after his children, would have been in vain? You went so far as to restore to an old soldier his imperial cross, a real relic most sacred in his eyes, and it was a touching sight. You did, too, unmask the Abbé d’Aigrigny and M. Baleinier, but I had resolved in unmasking them myself; still all this conspires to prove that you, sir, are a man of infinite ability.”

“Ah, mademoiselle!” said Rodin, humbly.

“Full of resource and invention.

“Ah, mademoiselle!”

“And it is not my fault, if, in our long conversation at M. Baleinier’s, you evinced that superior mind which impressed me. Yes, I confess it, deeply impressed me, and which seems at this moment somewhat embarrassed. Ah, sir! it is very difficult for an uncommon mind like yours to keep its incognito. Still, as it is possible, that by different paths—oh! very different,” added the young lady, with emphasis, “we are tending to the same end (according to our memorable conversation at M. Baleinier’s), I wish for the sake of our future communion (as you phrased it) to give you some advice, and to speak unreservedly to you.”

Rodin had listened to Mademoiselle de Cardoville apparently unmoved, with his hat under his arm, his hands folded beneath his waistcoat, and twiddling his thumbs: the only exterior sign of the internal dismay he experienced at the calm language of Adrienne was, that the livid eyelids of the Jesuit, hypocritically bent towards the ground, became more and more red, so violently did the blood suffuse them. Yet he replied to Mademoiselle de Cardoville, in a firm voice, and bowing profoundly,—

“ Good advice and frank language are always excellent things.”

“ Learn, sir,” resumed Adrienne, with slight excitement, “ that happy love gives such penetration, such energy, such courage, that perils are laughed at, snares detected, hatreds braved. Believe me, the divine light which beams around two loving hearts suffices to dissipate all darkness, to discover all stratagems. Mark me—in India—excuse my weakness, I love to talk of India,” added the young maiden, with inexpressible grace and delicacy of manner—“ in India, the travellers, in order to insure their tranquillity during the night, light up a large fire round their ajoupa (excuse, also, this tinge of local colouring), and as far as the luminous beams extend, they drive away, by their brilliancy alone, all impure and venomous reptiles, whom the light startles, because they only exist in darkness.”

“ The application of the comparison does not yet appear to me,” said Rodin, still twiddling his thumbs, and half raising his eyelids, still more and more suffused.

“ I will speak more plainly,” said Adrienne, smiling. “ Suppose, sir, that the last service that you have rendered the prince and myself—for you only rely on services rendered—is very new and very skilful, I acknowledge it.”

“ Bravo, my dear child !” said the count, joyfully ; “ the execution will be complete.”

“ Oh, it is an execution, is it ?” said Rodin, still not visibly moved.

“ No, sir,” replied Adrienne, smiling, “ it is only a conversation between a simple young girl and an old philosopher—the friend of good. Suppose, then, that the many services you have rendered me and mine have suddenly opened my eyes, or rather,” added the young lady, in a serious tone, “ suppose that God, who gives a mother the instinct to defend her child, has given me, with my happiness, the instinct to preserve that happiness, and that some indefinable presentiment, now lighting up a thousand circumstances until now obscure, has suddenly revealed to me, that instead of being my friend, you are, perhaps, the most dangerous enemy of me and my family.”

“ So then we pass from execution to suppositions,” said Rodin, as imperturbable as ever.

“ And from supposition, sir, if it must be said, to certainty,” replied Adrienne, with noble and calm dignity. “ Yes, now I believe I have been for some time your dupe, and I say it, sir, without hatred or anger, but with regret. It is painful to see a man of your understanding—your mind, stoop to such machinations, and after having set all the diabolical springs to work, to gain nothing but ridicule ; for can any thing be more ridiculous than for a man like you to be thwarted by a young girl, who has for her arms, her defence, her light—nothing but her love ? In a word, sir, from this day forth, I consider you as an implacable and dangerous enemy, for I now perceive your aim, though I cannot divine the means by which you seek to attain it ; but no doubt they will be worthy of the past. Well, in spite of all that, I do not fear you : from to-morrow, my family will be informed of all, and an active, unbroken, and resolved union will keep us all on our guard, for unquestionably it concerns this enormous inheritance which has been so nearly snatched from us. Now what relations can exist between the wrongs with which I reproach you and the pecuniary gain which is hoped for? I am utterly ignorant of this;—but you told me yourself, that my enemies were so dangerously skilled, and their plots so crafty, that I must expect every thing—foresee every thing; I well recollect that instruction—I promised you to be frank, sir, and I believe I have kept my word.”

“Frankness, supposing I were your enemy, would be most imprudent,” said Rodin, still impassive; “but you also promised me some advice, my dear young lady.”

“The advice shall be brief—do not contend with me, because there is, and you know it, something even more powerful than you and yours; it is a woman who is defending her happiness.”

Adrienne pronounced these last words with such sovereign confidence, her lovely face was radiant with such emboldened happiness, that Rodin, despite his phlegmatic audacity, was a moment dismayed. However, he betrayed no alarm, but after a moment's silence, he said, with an air of pity that was almost disdainful,—

“My dear young lady, we shall never meet again, in all human probability; but remember one thing which I repeat to you—I never justify myself; I leave that to the future. Yes, my dear young lady, I am, in spite of every thing, your most devoted servant,” and he bowed humbly. “M. le Comte, my respectful duty to you,” he added, bowing even lower to the Comte de Montbron, and then he left the room.

Scarcely was Rodin gone, than Adrienne ran to her desk, wrote a few words in haste, which she sealed and handed to M. de Montbron.

“I shall not see the prince before to-morrow, as much from superstition of heart, as because it is necessary for my plans that this interview be attended with some ceremony. You shall know all; but I will write to him instantly, for with such an enemy as M. Rodin, we must foresee every thing.”

“You are right, my dear child. The letter—quickly.”

Adrienne gave it to him.

“I tell him enough to calm his grief, and not enough to deprive me of the delight and joy of the surprise I have in store for him to-morrow.”

“This is all rational and affectionate, and I will hasten to the prince with your note. I shall not see him, for I could not answer for myself. But our ride and the play this evening, I suppose, are decided on?”

“Certainly; I feel quite a want of some relaxation till to-morrow: then I feel the open air will do me good, for my conversation with M. Rodin has somewhat excited me.”

“The old rascal!—but we will talk of him by and by. I am off to the prince, and will return with Madame de Morinval, to accompany you to the Champs Elysées.”

And the count hastily departed, as joyful now as he was unhappy and distressed when he entered the house.

CHAPTER XLVII.

THE CHAMPS ELYSÉES.

ABOUT two hours had elapsed since the conversation between Rodin and Mademoiselle de Cardoville, when most of the promenaders, attracted to the Champs Elysées by the loveliness of a day of spring (the month of March was nearly at its close), stopped to admire a most elegant equipage.

The reader will imagine a calèche of lapis lazuli blue, with white wheels, picked out with blue, drawn by four splendid blood bay horses, with black manes and tails, the harness of chased silver, and mounted by two small postilions, exactly of the same size, with black velvet jacket, light-blue cashmere waistcoat, with white collar, buckskin breeches, and top-boots; two tall and well-powdered footmen, also in light-blue liveries, with white collars and cuffs, were seated in the rumble behind.

It is impossible to imagine any thing in better taste, or an equipage more perfect; the horses high-bred, vigorous, and spirited, admirably driven by the postilions, stepped beautifully together, with elegant action, champing their bits covered with foam, and from time to time shaking their cockades of white and blue silk riband, in the centre of which bloomed a lovely rose.

A man on horseback, dressed in a very gentlemanly manner, following on the other side of the avenue, contemplated the equipage with a kind of satisfactory pride, as a thing of his own creation. This was M. de Bonneville, the esquire of Adrienne, as M. de Montbron called him, for this equipage was Mademoiselle de Cardoville's.

A change had taken place in the programme of this day of wonders.

M. de Montbron had not been able to give Djalma mademoiselle's billet, for the prince had that morning gone into the country with Marshal Simon, Faringhea said, but was expected back in the evening, when the letter would be handed to him on his arrival.

Completely reassured with respect to Djalma, and knowing that he would find a few lines, which, without informing him of all the happiness in store for him, would at least allow him to hope for it, Adrienne, complying with M. de Montbron's advice, had gone out for a ride in her carriage, in order to convince the world that she was quite determined, notwithstanding the prejudicial reports of Madame de Saint-Dizier, not to alter her resolution of living alone, and having a house to herself.

Adrienne wore a small white capote, with a short blonde veil, which dropped around rosy cheeks and golden hair; her high gown of garnet velvet was almost hidden beneath a large green cashmere shawl.

The young Marquise de Morinval, who was a very handsome and elegant person, was seated on her right hand, whilst M. de Montbron occupied a seat in front of the two ladies.

Those who know the Parisian world, or rather that imperceptible fraction of the Parisian world, which, for an hour or two, goes every sunny day to the Champs Elysées to see and be seen, will understand that the presence of Mademoiselle de Cardoville in this fashionable promenade must be an extraordinary event, something unheard of.

What is called the world could not believe its eyes, when it saw a young girl of eighteen, possessed of millions (of francs), belonging to the highest ranks of the nobility, thus coming to confirm, as it were to the eyes of all, by shewing herself in her carriage, that she actually did live entirely free and independent, contrary to all custom and all usual forms. This sort of emancipation seemed something monstrous, and they were the more surprised that the demeanour of the young lady, replete with grace and dignity, so completely falsified the calumnies, put in circulation by Madame de Saint-Dizier and her friends, relative to the pretended madness of her niece.

Many exquisites, profiting by their acquaintance with the Marquise de Morinval or M. de Montbron, came one after the other to make their bow, and walked their horses for a few minutes beside the calèche, in order to have an opportunity of seeing, admiring, and perhaps hearing, Mademoiselle de Cardoville, who crowned all their wishes by speaking with her usual charm and wit; and then surprise and enthusiasm reached their acmé, and what had been at first accused as whim, and almost lunacy, became delightfully original, and it only depended on Mademoiselle de Cardoville herself to be from this time forward deemed the queen of elegance and fashion.

The young lady perfectly well understood the impression she produced, and was happy and proud when she thought of Djalma; and when she compared him with these men of fashion, she was still more joyous. And, in fact, these young men, the majority of whom had never quitted Paris, or the more adventurous of whom had been as far as Naples or Baden-Baden, seemed to when compared with Djalma, who, at his age, had so often victoriously commanded and fought in bloody wars, and whose reputation for courage and heroic generosity was quoted with admiration by travellers coming to Paris from the remotest parts of India. And, moreover, the most exquisite dandies, with their small hats, their stiff cravats, and pinched-in riding coats, were not comparable with the Indian prince, whose graceful and manly beauty was the more heightened by the splendour of a costume at once so rich and so picturesque.

“Pale their ineffectual fires,”

All, therefore, on this day was happiness, joy, and love for Adrienne; the sun, sinking in a sky of splendid serenity, inundated the promenade with its golden rays; the air was balmy, carriages were crossing in all directions, cavaliers dashing about on prancing thorough-breds, whilst a light breeze agitated the scarfs of the ladies and the feathers in their bonnets—all was noise, motion, light.

Adrienne, leaning back in her carriage, was amusing herself by seeing all this brilliant display of Parisian luxury pass beneath her eyes; but in the midst of this dazzling chaos, she saw, “in her mind’s eye,” the melancholy and gentle features of Djalma, when something fell at her feet—she started!

It was a bunch of faded violets.

At the same moment she heard a child's voice, which said, as it followed the carriage,—

"Pour l'amour de Dieu, good lady, one little sou!"

Adrienne looked round, and saw a poor little girl, pale and wan, with a sad but pleasing countenance, hardly covered by the miserable rags that clung around her, who stretched out her little hands, and raised her supplicating eyes.

Although the striking contrast of extreme misery in the very bosom of extreme luxury is so common, that it is no longer remarkable, yet Adrienne was doubly affected; the recollection of La Mayeux at that moment, perchance a prey to the most fearful distress, came across her mind.

"Ah! at least," thought the young lady, "to-day must not be a day of entire happiness for myself alone."

Leaning a little out of the carriage, she said to the little girl,—

"Have you any mother, my child?"

"No, madame, neither mother nor father."

"Who takes care of you?"

"No one, madame; they give me nosegays to sell, and I am obliged to take back pence, or else they beat me."

"Poor little thing!"

"One sou, good lady, one sou, pour l'amour de Dieu," said the child, still following the carriage, which was moving on at a foot's pace.

"My dear count," said Adrienne, addressing M. de Montbron, "this will not be the first time you have carried off a young lady, if you will lean over, hold out your hands, and lift the poor little girl nicely into the carriage; we will hide her directly between Madame de Morinval and myself, and leave the promenade without any one perceiving the daring robbery."

"What?" exclaimed the count, surprised, "would you really?"

"Yes, I beg of you."

"Really what a folly!"

"Yesterday, perhaps, you might have called such a whim a folly, but to-day," and Adrienne laid emphasis on the word, and looked intelligently at M. de Montbron, "but to-day you ought to understand that it is almost a duty."

"Yes, I understand your good and noble heart," said the count, with an air of feeling, whilst Madame de Morinval, who was completely ignorant of Adrienne's love for Djalma, looked with as much surprise as curiosity at the count and the young girl.

M. de Montbron, leaning over the carriage-door, stretched forth his two hands to the child, and said, "Little one, give me both your hands."

The child, though much astonished, obeyed mechanically, and held out her two little arms, and the count, grasping her two wrists, very adroitly lifted her into the carriage—the more easily as it was very low, and, as we have said, moving on gently.

The child, more surprised than frightened, did not say a word. Adrienne and Madame de Morinval made room between them, and the little girl was speedily covered up and hidden beneath the ends of the two young ladies' shawls.

All this was executed so rapidly, that but very few persons passing along observed the carrying off.

"Now, my dear count," said Adrienne, joyously, "let us retreat as rapidly as may be with our prey."

M. de Montbron rose half up from his seat, and said to the postilion, "Home!" and the four horses went into a rapid and even trot.

"It seems to me now as if this day of happiness is consecrated, and my luxury is excused," thought Adrienne. "Until I can discover my poor Mayeux, by causing from to-day every possible search, her place will not be unoccupied."

There are singular coincidences. At the moment when this kind thought of La Mayeux came into Adrienne's mind, a large body of people were collected in the cross-alleys; several passers-by paused, and then others hastened to swell the group.

"Look, uncle," said Madame de Morinval, "what a crowd there is there! What can it be? Pray stop the carriage, that we may inquire the cause of this crowd."

"My dear, I am very sorry your curiosity cannot be gratified," said the count, taking out his watch; "but it is nearly six o'clock — the representation of the wild beasts will begin at eight o'clock, and we have only time to get home and dine. Don't you think so, my dear girl?" said he to Adrienne.

"Do you, Julie?" said Mademoiselle de Cardoville to the marquise.

"Certainly," replied the lady.

"I shall be the more obliged to you not to delay," added the count, "as after I have conducted you to the Porte-Saint-Martin, I shall be obliged to return to my club for half an hour, to vote for Lord Campbell, whom I have proposed."

"Then Adrienne and I shall be alone at the theatre, uncle?"

"Why, I suppose your husband will be with you."

"To be sure, uncle; but do not on that account leave us longer than you can help."

"Rely on that, for I am at least as curious as you are to see this famous Morok, the incomparable tamer of wild beasts."

Some minutes afterwards, Mademoiselle de Cardoville's carriage, having left the Champs Elysées carrying off the little girl, went towards the Rue d'Anjou. At the moment when this brilliant equipage disappeared, the assemblage which we have mentioned had increased, and a large crowd was now gathered round one of the large trees in the Champs Elysées, and from time to time, exclamations of pity and commiseration were heard from amongst them. A lounge coming up to a young man who was standing outside this crowd, said to him,—

"What is the matter there?"

"Oh, a poor creature—a young humpbacked girl, who has fainted from exhaustion."

"A humpbacked girl—what a fuss! There are enough humpbacked people every where," said the inquirer, with a coarse grin.

"Humpbacked or not, if she is dying of hunger," replied the young man, hardly able to repress his indignation, "it is not the less lamentable, and I do not see any thing to laugh at, sir!"

"Dying of hunger—bah!" said the lounge, shrugging his shoulders. "There are none but the skulkers, who won't work, who die of hunger — and why shouldn't they?"

"And I will bet, sir, that there is a death of which you will never die," exclaimed the young man, indignant at the brutality of the man.

"What do you mean?" inquired the loungeur, with hauteur.

"I mean to say, sir, that your heart will never choke you."

"Sir!" cried the loungeur, in an angry tone.

"Well, what, sir?" retorted the young man, looking the speaker full in the face.

"Nothing!" said the loungeur: and, turning quickly on his heels, he went grumbling towards his cabriolet, with an orange body, on which was an enormous coat of arms, having the crest of a baron. A servant, absurdly laced with gold and green, and having an enormous aiguillette, which bobbed against the calves of his legs, was standing by the horse, and did not perceive his master.

"Why, you stupid fellow, are you yawning at the rooks?" said his master, poking him with the end of his cane.

The servant turned round in confusion.

"Monsieur, I was ——"

"Will you never say, 'Monsieur le Baron,' you ass?" exclaimed the angry loungeur. "Open the cab, can't you?"

The loungeur was M. Tripeaud, the manufacturing baron, hyæna, and stock-jobber. The poor humpbacked creature was, indeed, La Mayeux, who had dropped down, exhausted by misery and want, as she was on her way to Mademoiselle de Cardoville's.

The unhappy girl had found courage to brave the shame and cruel jesting which she expected to endure on returning to the house whence she had voluntarily exiled herself; but now it was not for herself she thought, but of her sister, Céphyse, the Queen-Bacchanal, who had returned to Paris on the previous evening, and whom La Mayeux hoped, by Adrienne's favour, to snatch from a frightful destiny.

* * * * *

Two hours after those different scenes, an immense crowd was collected round the Porte-Saint-Martin, in order to be present at the exercises of Morok, who was to imitate a combat with the famous black panther of Java, called La Mort.

Adrienne, M. and Madame de Morinval alighted from their carriage at the entrance to the theatre, where they were to be joined by the Comte de Montbron, whom they had dropped at his club on their way thither.

CHAPTER XLVIII.

BEHIND THE CURTAIN.

THE immense theatre of the Porte-Saint-Martin was crowded by an impatient audience.

All Paris, as M. de Montbron had said to Mademoiselle de Cardoville, was hurrying, with intense and increasing curiosity, to the representations of Morok. It is useless to say, that the tamer of beasts had completely abandoned his small trade in pious toys, in which he had dealt so profitably during his sojourn at the hostelry of the White Falcon, near Leipsic, and the large pictures, in which the surprising effects of Morok's sudden conversion had been painted so conspicuously, were also destroyed or unemployed, such superannuated miracles not being in fashion at Paris.

Morok was finishing his preparations in one of the dressing-rooms which had been assigned to him. Over his coat-of-mail, his greaves, and his armlets, he wore a large pair of red trousers, fastened about the ankles by gilt bangles. His long caftan of black worsted, with purple and gold, was confined about the waist and wrists by other large gilt metal rings. This sombre costume gave the brute-tamer a look even more sinister than usual. His thick, yellowish beard fell in a large mass over his chest, and he was gravely folding a large piece of white muslin round his red cap. A devotee in Germany, and a pantomimist in Paris, Morok knew as well as his patrons how to accommodate himself to circumstances.

Seated in a corner of the dressing-room, and contemplating him with a kind of stupid admiration, was Jacques Rennepont, called Couche-tout-Nu. Since the day in which M. Hardy's premises were destroyed by fire, Jacques had never quitted Morok, passing every night in orgies, whose fierce ravages the iron frame of the brute-queller braved with impunity.

Jacques's countenance, on the contrary, began to alter excessively; his livid features, his marble paleness, and his gaze, sometimes stupid, and sometimes ardent, betrayed the rapid inroads of low debauchery; whilst a sort of bitter and derisive smile continually played on his parched lips. His mind, formerly lively and gay, still seemed as though desirous to struggle against the deadening influence of an almost perpetual intoxication. Unfit for work, unable to exist without gross pleasures, and seeking to drown in liquor the last relics of good feeling remaining in him, and which revolted at his conduct, Jacques had come down without shame to accept the large amount of brutalising enjoyments which Morok found for him, he always paying the very considerable amount of their sensual revels, but never giving Jacques any money, in order to keep him wholly dependent on himself.

After having gazed some time at Morok with amaze, Jacques said to him,—

"Well, I must say that yours is a fine profession—you may boast fairly, that at this moment there are not two such men as you in the world, and that is flattering. What a pity it is you do not confine yourself to one trade!"

"What do you mean?"

"What is this conspiracy, on account of which you feast and feed me so merrily every day and every night?"

"Oh! it proceeds; but the moment has not yet come, and that is why I wish to have you constantly near me until the important hour. Have you any thing to complain of?"

"Oh, no!" replied Jacques. "What reason have I? Scorched up by brandy as I am, if I had the inclination to work, I have not the strength. I have not, as you have, a marble head and an iron frame ; but to get drunk on gunpowder would suit me better than any thing else, and that is all I am now fit for, and yet it does not prevent me from thinking."

"Of what?"

"You know very well when I think, I think of one thing only," said Jacques, with a sombre air.

"The Queen-Bacchanal? What still?" said Morok, with disdain.

"Yes, continually—for ever—a little; and when I cease to think of her at all, I shall be dead, or become a thorough brute—the devil!"

"Why, you were never in better health, and never betrayed more life and wit, you blockhead," replied Morok, as he arranged his turban.

The conversation was here interrupted. Goliath entered the room suddenly.

The gigantic height of this Hercules was even bulkier than ever. He was dressed like Alcides, his enormous limbs, furrowed by veins as thick as a thumb, swelled under a flesh-coloured suit, beneath a pair of red drawers.

"What do you mean by rushing in here with all this uproar?" demanded Morok.

"It ain't much of an uproar compared with what the folks are making in the house. The company has got impatient, and is crying out like mad things for us to begin. However, if there was nothing more the matter than that——"

"What is it then?"

"Why, La Mort can't perform to-night."

Morok turned quickly round, and asked almost uneasily, "And wherefore cannot he?"

"I tell you he can't. I've just been to look at him, and there he lies stretched out at the bottom of his cage, with his ears so flattened down to his head, that you would almost fancy somebody had been and cut them off. You know very well what that means."

"Is that all?" said Morok, turning to the looking-glass to finish the arrangement of his head-dress.

"And enough, too, I should think, since it shews that he is in one of his fits of fury. I have not seen him so savage since that night when he tore the old screw of a horse to pieces in Germany. Why, his eyeballs glare like two fiery coals!"

"Then all you have to do is to put his pretty little collar on him," said Morok, calmly.

"His collar?"

"Yes, his collar with the springs."

"A very pretty job, forsooth! to be femme de chambre to such a toilette!"

"Silence!"

"That is not all!" continued Goliath, with an embarrassed air.

"What more?"

"I'd rather tell you another time."

"Will you speak when you are bid?"

"Well, then, he is here!"

"Who, you stupid brute?"

MOROK PREPARING FOR THE THEATRE.

"The Englishman!"

Morok started, and his arms fell listlessly by his sides.

"The Englishman?" cried Morok, addressing Goliath. "Have you seen him? Are you quite sure it is he?"

"Quite, quite sure. I was looking from the hole in the curtain, and I spied him in a small box almost on the stage. I suppose he wants to have as good a view as he can! There's no mistaking him; and I should have recognised his high narrow forehead, large nose, and great round eyes from any distance."

Morok again trembled, and this time almost convulsively; while Jacques, surprised at seeing a man usually so imperturbable and self-possessed thus violently agitated and alarmed, could not forbear asking,—

"Who and what is this Englishman?"

"I first met him at Strasbourg," returned Morok, with the deepest dejection; "since which he has followed me unceasingly; travelling short stages with his own horses, and invariably stopping wherever I stopped, in order that he might be present at every performance I gave. But two days before my arrival in Paris, he quitted me, and I hoped I was delivered from him," added Morok, with a deep sigh.

"Delivered!" replied Jacques, with surprise. "Why, what could make you wish to be delivered from so excellent a customer, so warm an admirer?"

"Listen!" said Morok, whose melancholy and trepidation continued to increase; "the wretch has wagered a considerable sum, that I shall be devoured in his presence by my own beasts during one of my exhibitions; and he hopes to gain his bet, that is why he so pertinaciously pursues me."

To Couche-tout-Nu this explanation appeared so replete with absurdity as well as eccentricity, that, for the first time for a long period, he burst into a loud and unconstrained laugh.

Morok, becoming livid with rage, threw himself on him with such deadly fury that Goliath was obliged to interfere.

"Come, come," said Jacques, "don't put yourself in such a passion; if the matter is so serious, I will not laugh any more."

Morok became calm, and, addressing Jacques, said, in a low hoarse voice,—

"Do you consider me a coward?"

"No, upon my life I do not!"

"Well, then, this Englishman, spite of his grotesque appearance, inspires me with a fear greater than that I ever felt for either my tiger or panther."

"You tell me so,—and I believe you," replied Jacques; "but still I cannot comprehend in what manner the presence of this man can so alarm you."

"Why, remember, idiot," exclaimed Morok, "that compelled as I am to keep incessant watch over the slightest movement of the ferocious animal I control only with my gesture or look, it must needs be a very intimidating thing for me to know and to feel that two eager eyes are fixed on me with intense interest, in the hopes of seeing me torn to pieces by the beast I am contending with!"

"Yes, yes!" said Jacques, shuddering in his turn, "now, indeed,

I fully understand your alarm ; it is, indeed, enough to make any man feel afraid."

"Aye, and once there, it is useless for me to feign not to perceive this unlucky Englishman. Do what I will to drive him from my thoughts, he is ever before me, staring with his fixed great round eyes. Already have I nearly fallen a prey to my tiger Cain, who all but devoured my arm, during a momentary forgetfulness on my part, produced by the presence of this infernal Englishman, whom may the devil carry off ere he brings me to further evil ! Blood and thunder !" exclaimed Morok, "I feel assured this man is my evil genius, and will bring destruction on me ;" and again Morok paced the lodge in an agony of fear.

"Ah, and when you consider what a state La Mort is in !" interposed Goliath, with coarse brutality, "with his ears almost plastered down to his head ! I tell you what, master, don't be a fool ; for if you persist in having him to appear to-night, why the Englishman will gain his wager,—that's all !"

"Begone, brute !" exclaimed Morok, goaded almost to madness ; "drive me not wild with your croakings and predictions of evil, but get you hence and prepare the collar for La Mort."

"Well, I am agreeable if you are !" said the giant, quitting the box after having delivered himself of his witticism ; "every one to his liking, and if you choose the panther to eat his supper off you, why that's your affair, not mine."

"But why," said Couche-tout-Nu, "since you entertain this dread, should you not announce to the audience that the panther is too ill to appear this evening ?"

Morok shrugged his shoulders, and replied, with a species of savage excitement,—

"Have you ever heard of the fierce pleasure of the gambler, who stakes honour—life on a card ? Well, I, too, in the daily exercises in which my life is risked, find equally a wild and fierce pleasure, in daring death in presence of a trembling crowd, aghast at my audacity. In truth, in the terror with which this Englishman inspires me, I sometimes experience, in spite of myself, a kind of indescribable excitement which I abhor, and yet which dominates over me."

The prompter, entering the beast-tamer's room, interrupted him,—

"May we give the signal, Monsieur Morok ?" he inquired ; "the overture only lasts ten minutes."

"Yes," replied Morok.

"The Commissary of Police has just examined again the double chain for the panther, and the ring attached to the floor of the stage, at the end of the cavern in the first entrance," added the prompter, "and he says that it is excessively and sufficiently strong."

"Yes, sufficiently strong—except for me," murmured the beast-subduer.

"Then we may begin, Monsieur Morok ?"

"You may begin," replied Morok. And the prompter left the dressing-room.

CHAPTER XLIX.

THE RISE OF THE CURTAIN.

THE customary signal sounded solemnly behind the curtain, the overture commenced, and, to say truth, was very little attended to.

The theatre presented a very animating sight. Except two stage-boxes, one on the right, and the other on the left hand of the audience, every place was occupied.

A considerable number of females elegantly attired, who had as usual been attracted by the wild peculiarity of the performances, filled the boxes; whilst the stalls were for the most part occupied by the young gentry, who had been during the morning taking their rides in the Champs Elysées.

A few words exchanged from one stall to another will give some idea of the conversation.

"I tell you what, my dear fellow, there would not be such a crowd, nor such a fashionable audience, to see Athalie!"

"Decidedly not. What are the miserable rantings of an actor compared with the roarings of an actual lion?"

"I really cannot understand how they allow this Morok to fasten his panther in one corner of the stage with an iron chain attached to a ring. Suppose the chain were to break?"

"Talking of breaking chains. Look at that pretty little flirt Madame de Blinville, who is not a tigress. Do you see her in the front of the first circle?"

"Oh! it suits her delightfully to have broken the conjugal chain, as you say. She is quite lovely though this season."

"Oh! there is the charming Duchesse de Saint-Prix. Why, really, all that is elegant and modish is here to-night—ourselves of course excepted."

"It is, really, quite an Italian Opera, and every body seems prepared to be gay and amused!"

"After all, people are right to be amused—it is probable that they will not be long so."

"Why not?"

"Suppose the cholera were to come to Paris?"

"Ah, bah!"

"Don't you believe in the cholera?"

"Parbleu! it seems to come from the north, walking-stick in hand."

"May the devil fly away with it on the road, so that we may not see its green visage here."

"They say it is in London."

"I hope it may remain there."

"For my part I'd rather talk of something else; it may be a weakness, but it always puts me out of spirits to talk of it."

"I quite agree with you."

"Oh! it is really she—I am not mistaken!"

"Who?"

"Mademoiselle de Cardoville, who has just entered the stage-box with Morinval and his wife. This is really a resurrection—this morning in the Champs Elysées, this evening here."

"Yes, really it is Mademoiselle de Cardoville."

"Oh! what a delicious girl!"

"Lend me your lorgnette."

"Well, what do you say?"

"Lovely! charming!"

"And with her beauty, she has the wit of a démon, eighteen years of age, three hundred thousand francs (12,000*l.*) a-year, high birth, and is as free as air."

"Yes, only to imagine, that if she but said the word, I might be to-morrow, or even this very night, the happiest of men!"

"Why, you would go raving mad."

"I am told that her house in the Rue d'Anjou is enchantment. I hear of a bath-room and bed-room worthy of the Arabian Nights' Entertainments."

"And free as air—that's the thing."

"Ah! if I were in her place!"

"Oh, I should do all sorts of things!"

"Ah, messieurs! what a happy mortal will he be who is the first loved!"

"Do you think, then, she will have more loves than one?"

"Being free as air."

"All the boxes are now filled, except the stage-box opposite Mademoiselle de Cardoville—happy they who have engaged that box!"

"Do you see the English Ambassador's lady in one of the dress boxes?"

"And the Princess d'Avilmar. What a monster bouquet!"

"I should like to know the name of that bouquet."

"Parbleu! it is Germigny!"

"How flattering to the lions and tigers to attract such a splendid company!"

"Look, messieurs, how all the élégantes are levelling their lorgnettes at Mademoiselle de Cardoville!"

"She creates quite a sensation."

"She's quite right to shew herself, for they tried to make out that she was a lunatic."

"Only look what an attractive countenance!"

"Where? where?"

"There, in the small box under that of Mademoiselle de Cardoville."

"Why, it is a pair of Nuremberg nut-crackers."

"Why, it is a wooden man."

"Look at his round goggle eyes."

"That nose!"

"That forehead!"

"It is a mask."

"Silence, silence, the curtain is going up."

The curtain rose at this moment.

Some words of explanation are requisite in order to understand what follows.

The ground tier of the stage boxes on the left of the spectator, was divided into two boxes, in one of which were several persons, who have been alluded to by the young men in the stalls.

The other compartment, the side nearest the stage, was occupied by the Englishman, that eccentric and sinister better who inspired Morok with so much fear.

We should be endowed with the rare and fantastic genius of Hoffman in order to paint worthily this physiognomy, at once so grotesque and frightful, which was visible from the dark shades of the back of the box.

This Englishman was about fifty years of age, with a forehead completely bald and conical; beneath which, surmounted with eyebrows shaped like circumflex accents, glared two large green eyes, singularly round and fixed, and very close to a nose that was very projecting and very sharp: a chin, like what is vulgarly called nut-cracker, half disappeared in a high and full cravat of white cambric, not less stiffly starched than the shirt-collar, which was rounded at the ends, and reached almost as high as the lobe of the ear. The hue of this excessively thin and bony face was, however, a very deep red, almost purple, which heightened the effect of the bright green pupils, and the white of the balls of his eyes. The mouth, enormously wide, sometimes imperceptibly whistled a Scotch jig (always the same tune), and was sometimes contracted slightly towards the corners by a sardonic smile.

The Englishman was otherwise dressed with extreme elegance. His blue coat, with metal buttons, shewed his Marseilles waistcoat, of colour as snowy white as his large cravat: two splendid rubies formed his shirt-studs, and he leaned on the edge of his box, his aristocratic hands carefully covered with glazed kid gloves.

When we know the singular and cruel desire which had brought this better to all these representations, his grotesque countenance, instead of exciting a derisive laugh, became almost fearful, and we may then understand the sort of oppressive nightmare which Morok experienced at the sight of those two large eyes, so round and fixed, which seemed patiently to await the death of the tamer of brutes (and what a horrible death!) with inexorable confidence.

Above the dark box of the Englishman, and presenting a graceful contrast, were M. and Madame de Morinval and Mademoiselle de Cardoville. The latter had taken her seat on the side nearest to the stage. She had her hair exquisitely arranged, and wore a sky-blue china crape gown, with a large brooch, with orient pearls suspended from it, in the front of her boddice—nothing more, and she looked charmingly thus. In her hand she held an enormous bouquet, composed of the rarest flowers of India: the stephanotis and gardenia mingled their deep whiteness with the purple of the hibiscus and the amaryllis of Java.

Madame de Morinval, placed on the other side of the box, was also attired with taste and simplicity. M. de Morinval, a very good-looking, elegant, and fair young man, was seated behind the two ladies, who were expecting M. de Montbron every moment.

We must remind the reader that the stage-box opposite to Adrienne had been unoccupied up to this time.

The stage represented one of the gigantic forests of India. At the back there were large exotic trees, which spread out their leaves like umbrellas or arrows on the angular parts of the rugged rocks, leaving visible only a few corners of a red sky. Each wing formed a clump of trees intersected by rocks, and on the left of the audience, and exactly under Adrienne's box, was the irregular opening of a dark and deep cavern, which seemed half-broken in by a mass of granite blocks, strewed there by some volcanic eruption.

This spot of savage wildness and grandeur was marvellously done, and the illusion rendered as complete as possible. The lamps round the front of the stage, were shaded with a purple hue, which threw over this sinister landscape those burning yet dark tints, which heightened still more this gloomy and impressive aspect.

Adrienne was leaning a little forward in her box, her cheeks slightly flushed, her eyes sparkling, and her heart palpitating; whilst she sought to discover in this representation the lonely forest described by the traveller, who related with how much generous intrepidity Djalma had precipitated himself on a tigress in her rage to save the life of a poor black slave, who had taken refuge in a cavern.

And, indeed, chance served marvellously to aid the memory of the young lady. Deeply absorbed in the contemplation of the scene, and by the ideas which they awakened in her bosom, she only thought of what was passing in the theatre.

Yet there was something passing in the opposite stage-box, empty until then, which was curious enough.

The door of this box was opened.

A man of forty years of age, with dark features, had entered, dressed like an Indian, with a long robe of orange silk, fastened round his loins by a green waistband, and he wore a small white turban. After having placed two chairs in the front of the box, looked about him for a moment all round the theatre, he started suddenly, his eyes sparkled, and he withdrew instantly.

This man was Faringhea. His appearance caused considerable surprise, mingled with curiosity, amongst the auditory; for the majority of the audience had not like Adrienne a thousand reasons for being absorbed by the contemplation only of a picturesque decoration.

The attention of the public was increased on seeing a young man of extreme beauty, dressed as an Indian, in a long robe of white cashmere with loose sleeves, and a scarlet turban, striped with gold like his belt, in which shone a poniard, sparkling with precious stones, enter the box which Faringhea had just quitted.

This young man was Djalma. For an instant he stood erect at the door, casting from the back of his box a careless look over the immense audience, and then advancing a few steps, with an air of easy and graceful majesty, the prince seated himself quietly on one of the chairs; then turning his head towards the door, after a few seconds he seemed astonished at not seeing some one enter for whom he was evidently waiting.

She appeared at length—the box-door opener having assisted her to take off her cloak.

This person was a lovely fair girl, dressed with more show than taste, having on a gown of white silk, deep with wide cherry-coloured stripes, cut very low in the neck, with short sleeves; whilst two large bows of cherry riband, placed on each side of her chestnut hair, enclosed one of the prettiest, most coquettish, and most arch countenances, ever looked at and admired.

Of course this was Rose-Pompon, wearing white long gloves absurdly loaded with bracelets; which, however, but half-concealed her lovely arms, and in her hands she held an enormous bouquet of roses.

Far from imitating the quiet demeanour of Djalma, Rose-Pompon came bounding into the box, moving the chairs noisily, and fidgeting about in her seat for some time before she settled herself, then spreading out her fine gown, without being in the slightest degree intimidated by this brilliant assemblage, she made a little flirting movement, in which she put her nosegay of roses under Djalma's nose, and then appeared to find her just equilibrium on the seat she occupied.

Faringhea now entered, closed the door of the box, and took his seat behind the prince.

Adrienne, all this time deeply absorbed in the contemplation of the Indian forest and in her sweet recollections, had not observed the arrival of these new comers.

As she had completely turned away her head from the side of the theatre, and Djalma could at this time see no more than her half-concealed profile, he had not yet recognised Mademoiselle de Car-doville.

CHAPTER L.

LA MORT.

THE programme of the performances at the Porte-Saint-Martin passed so lightly over the combat between Morok and the black panther, that it escaped the notice of the greater part of the audience, whose whole curiosity and interest seemed lodged in the scene in which the brute-conqueror was to appear in all his glory.

This indifference on the part of the public explains the curiosity produced among the assembled spectators by the arrival of Faringhea and Djalma, and which manifested itself (as we have recently seen upon the occasion of the Arabs appearing in any public place*) by a slight whisper, and general movement among the assemblage.

The smiling prettiness of Rose-Pompon, captivating even in spite of her glaring toilette, so completely out of character for such a theatre as the Porte-Saint-Martin, added to her extremely free and easy manners, with the more than familiarity of her conduct towards the handsome Asiatic who accompanied her, increased and inflamed the universal astonishment; for, at the very moment when all eyes were on the box, Rose-Pompon, yielding with all the wilfulness of her untamed character to the impulse of the moment, held her large bouquet of roses up to the prince's face, trying, with the most winning and coquettish smiles, to induce him to return her attentions; but the prince, at the sight of the stage scenery, which so forcibly recalled his native country, instead of appearing sensible of this mirthful provocation, continued for several minutes to gaze steadfastly on the theatre; while Rose-Pompon, finding herself unnoticed, found solace in beating time with her bouquet on the cushion of the box, while the rapid contortions and undulations of her fair shoulders evinced that that animated dancer was becoming powerfully impressed with choreographic ideas, more or less "storm-blown," as the orchestra struck up a well-known and exhilarating air.

* This refers to the recent visit of the Arab chiefs to Paris in the year 1844. Theirs was a journey of amusement and instruction, and they were every where well received, even by royalty itself.—Trans.

Seated immediately opposite the box where Faringhea, Djalma, and Rose-Pompon, had taken up their stations, Madame de Morinval had quickly perceived the arrival of the last-named personages, neither did the coquettish whimsicalities of Rose-Pompon escape her notice; stooping forwards, therefore, towards Mademoiselle de Cardoville, who still remained buried in her pleasing reveries, the young marquise said smilingly,—

"Upon my word, all the amusement of the evening is not confined to the stage. Pray look just opposite to us!"

"Directly opposite, do you mean?" repeated Adrienne, mechanically; and withdrawing herself from her pleasing contemplation, she languidly directed her looks in the direction indicated by Madame de Morinval. Heavens! what a sight met her eyes! She beheld Djalma seated beside a young and charming girl, who, with all the assumption of well-established familiarity, was holding a bouquet to his face, and with coquettish playfulness striving to make him inhale its odour.

Stunned, as though struck to the heart by some electric shock, at once sharp and profound, Adrienne became deadly pale, and almost instinctively she closed her eyes, as if to shut out the fearful picture, with an effort as powerless as the victim of an assassin's knife faintly tries to turn away the dagger which has already been plunged in the breast.

"Djalma here! and in company with another!" said she, mentally; "after receiving my letter, which opened to him such a prospect of happiness!"

And at the bare idea of so cruel and insulting an act, the blush of mingled shame and indignation replaced the pallor of Adrienne's cheek, while, staggering beneath the too fatal reality, she internally cried, "Ah, Rodin did not deceive me after all!"

We must resign all attempts to paint the overwhelming rapidity of emotions, which torture and annihilate in less time than they can be related. Thus Adrienne from the sunny summit of the most radiant happiness, had been precipitated in less than a second to the lowest depths of the most poignant misery; for scarcely a minute had elapsed, when she replied to Madame de Morinval,—

"What is it, my dear Julie, you find to amuse you so much in the opposite box?"

And this evasive mode of speech afforded the heartwrung girl time to recover her self-possession. Fortunately, the long ringlets which hung down her face entirely concealed the pallid hue of her cheeks, so that her rapid alternation of colour was entirely lost upon Madame de Morinval, who gaily replied,—

DJALMA AND ROSE-POMFON.

“Is it possible, my dear Adrienne, that you have not observed those Indians who but now entered the opposite stage-box? There, there, directly before us.

“Ah! yes, yes, I see!” said Adrienne, in a firm voice.

“Well, and do you not think them a very curious party?” continued the marquise.

“Come, come, ladies,” said M. de Morinval, laughing; “have a little mercy upon poor strangers who are ignorant of our customs and observances; let that plead in excuse for their thus exhibiting themselves in public in such very questionable company.”

“Truly,” said Adrienne, with a bitter smile, “their ingenuous forgetfulness of propriety is almost too much of untaught simplicity.”

“Upon my word, though,” said the marquise, “the female is really a very pretty creature. It is rather a pity she did not observe a little more decency in covering up her neck and arms, she must be half-perished with cold in that exposed state. I should say she could be scarcely sixteen or seventeen years of age. Is it not lamentable to see one so young so far gone in vice?”

“You and your husband are quite in a charitable vein to-night, my dear Julie,” replied Adrienne; “first you ask me to pity the Indian, then the creature he has brought with him. Now, then, who is it your good pleasure I should compassionate next?”

“No, no! I disclaim all pity for the handsome Indian in the scarlet and gold turban, that would be quite misplaced; for see how the pretty girl in the cherry-coloured ribands looks at him, as though devouring him with her eyes; just see how she hangs over her royal sultan—I think she is going to embrace him!”

“They are very amusing, to say the least of them,” rejoined the marquise, partaking of the hilarity of her lord, and eyeing Rose-Pompon through her opera-glass; then, after a momentary pause, she addressed Adrienne, saying, “I am certain of one thing, however, and that is, that spite of all her airs and graces, the girl opposite is really passionately enamoured of her dark lover. I caught a look just now which contained volumes.”

“But wherefore should you waste your penetration upon matters that do not in the least concern us?” asked Adrienne, gently. “What good can it do us to read the thoughts of the girl?”

“Well, all I can say is,” said the marquis, in his turn directing his glass against his opposite neighbours, “that if she does love her Indian, I give her credit for excellent taste, I think I never saw a more perfectly beautiful countenance than that of the young Asiatic; true I can only see the profile, but that is pure and regular as an antique cameo. Do you not think so?” added M. Morinval, addressing Adrienne. “Remember it is simply taken in an artistical view that I venture to ask your opinion.”

“As an object of art, certainly,” said Adrienne, “the countenance you allude to is very handsome.”

“Well, really!” said the marquise, “that little lady in the red ribands, is as impertinent as she is pretty; do you not observe how she is pointing her glass at us, and how fixedly she is gazing?"

"Capital!" rejoined the marquis; "and pray observe how free and easily she places her hand on the shoulder of the prince, as if to make him share in the admiration with which you no doubt inspire her, Mademoiselle de Cardoville."

And in fact, wholly absorbed in the scenic decorations, recalling as they did so forcibly the home and native land of Djalma, the prince had taken not the slightest notice of all the coquettish attempts of Rose-Pompon to attract his notice, neither had he perceived the presence of Adrienne in the house.

"Oh look! pray do," said Rose-Pompon, moving about in the front of the box, and continuing to gaze through her opera-glass, at Mademoiselle de Cardoville (who, and not Madame de Morinval, attracted her eager attention). "I never saw such a thing before in my life as a beautiful woman with red hair! But just look in the box opposite, prince charmant, and you will see such a lovely creature, with rich golden hair, some would, perhaps, call red, but it is such a red, all manner of bright shades—and what a heavenly countenance!" and as she pronounced these words, she, as has already been described, tapped Djalma on the shoulder, who, looking in the direction indicated, was first made sensible of the presence of Mademoiselle de Cardoville. Although partly prepared for this meeting, the prince experienced an emotion so sudden and overpowering, that he forgot every thing but the beautiful object of his passionate love; involuntarily he rose from his seat, and was about to proceed at once to the box which contained the centre of all his hopes, when he felt the iron hand of Faringhea placed vigorously on his shoulder, while speaking rapidly in the Hindostanee language, the Metis exclaimed, "Courage! and to-morrow will see this woman at your feet;" and as Djalma struggled to free himself, Faringhea added, in order to restrain him, "But now I saw her turn alternately from red to pale—the effects of her jealous anger—No weakness, or all is lost!"

"I say!" said Rose-Pompon, turning abruptly round, "I won't have you talk in my presence in that abominable patois of yours; in the first place, it is not vastly civil; and in the second, it sounds so harsh and disagreeable, that it always reminds me of cracking nuts, and I'm sure I wish I had some just now, for it's very dull, nobody speaking to me, or taking any notice of me."

"It was of yourself I was speaking to my lord," said the Metis; "it referred to an agreeable surprise he is preparing for you."

"A surprise? Oh, that's nice! I do so love to be surprised. Make haste, then, prince charmant," cried she, regarding Djalma with an affectionate look, — "make haste, will you, and let me know all about it, too."

"My heart is crushed!" said Djalma, in a low, hoarse tone, still addressing Faringhea, in his native language.

"And to-morrow it will bound with joy and gladness," replied the Metis. "It is only by cold contempt that a proud and haughty woman can be subdued; and I again repeat, to-morrow will see her trembling and confused, a suppliant at your feet!"

"Alas, no!" returned the prince, with affecting mournfulness; "by to-morrow she will hate and detest me for ever!"

"Yes, if she now sees you cowardly and weak — it is too late to recede. Look at her fully in the face, and then take the bouquet your young companion holds in her hand, and carry it to your lips — then will you see this haughty woman change colour rapidly, as she did just now. Shall I then be believed by my lord?"

Driven by despair to a desire of essaying every means of obtaining a return to his love, and fascinated, even in spite of his better judgment, by the evil counsels of Faringhea, Djalma, first attentively regarding Mademoiselle de Cardoville, took, with a trembling hand, the bouquet from Rose-Pompon, and again fixing his gaze on the countenance of Adrienne, pressed the flowers to his lips. At this bitter outrage, Mademoiselle de Cardoville started so convulsively, and her features assumed a look so agonising, that the prince easily perceived it.

"She is yours!" exclaimed the Metis. "Did you observe, my lord, how she shuddered with jealousy? She is yours. Courage! and she will yet prefer you to that handsome young man placed behind her, for he it is who is your rival! and whom she has imagined she loved more than you!" And as though foreseeing the whirlwind of rage and hatred this disclosure would awaken in the mind of the prince, he rapidly added, "Yes, calmness and contempt are the weapons with which a proud woman must be assailed. Think you not that arrogant and favoured lover will have just cause to hate you for to-night's work?"

The prince passed his hand over his brows, burning with fiery indignation, while he forcibly repressed any further demonstration of his wrathful feelings.

"Good gracious me!" cried Rose-Pompon, poutingly, to Faringhea, "what can you be possibly saying to him to worry him like this?" then addressing Djalma, she said, "Come, prince charmant, as we say in the fairy books, please to give me back my bouquet;" and with these words, she took it from the unconscious hand that held it, exclaiming, "Ah! I saw you press it to your lips! I could almost eat it up after you have made it so sweet!" And then sighing, and casting a look of passionate tenderness on Djalma, she added, "Ah! that monster of a Nini-Moulin did not deceive me. All is very innocent between us. I have not so much as that to reproach myself for;" and with her small white teeth she bit the extremity of the rose-coloured nails of her right hand, from which she had withdrawn the glove.

It is scarcely necessary to say that Adrienne's letter had never been received by the prince; neither was it true that he had gone into the country with Maréchal Simon.

During the three days in which M. de Montbron had not seen Djalma, Faringhea had persuaded the prince that by giving publicity to the story of his having formed another attachment, he should reduce Mademoiselle de Cardoville to listen to his suit. In order to account for Djalma's appearance at the theatre, it is merely necessary to say, that it was arranged in consequence of Rodin having been informed by Florine of her mistress's intention to visit the Porte-Saint-Martin.

Before Djalma had recognised her, Adrienne, feeling her strength fail her, had been upon the point of quitting the theatre. That the man to whom she had hitherto assigned so high a place in her affections,—whom she had worshipped as a demigod, and believing him to be plunged in a state of deep despair, had even departed from the severe etiquette prescribed for her sex, and written him, in all the fullness of confiding love, lines full of hope and sweet assurances, should thus have repaid her generous and unsuspecting affection, by appearing before her, after the receipt of her billet of fond promises and encouraging words, in company with a being so lost as was his unfortunate companion, stung the proud spirit of Adrienne to the quick. And little mattered it to her tortured feelings whether the outrage had been premeditated or not. But when she found herself recognised by the prince, when carrying his insulting conduct so far as to look her full in the face, and, as if trying to brave her utmost indignation, raise to his lips the bouquet belonging to the guilty creature he had publicly intruded on her notice; then Adrienne's weakness was gone, and far from thinking of returning home, she determined to remain, and even experienced a sort of barbarous pleasure in witnessing the last expiring struggles of the pure, celestial flame which had burnt so brightly in her heart.

With front erect, proud and sparkling eye, and lip curled with the most withering contempt, Adrienne returned the prince's gaze with unflinching firmness, then turning to the marquise, who, in common with the rest of the audience, was entirely engrossed by the preparations and decorations of the stage, she said,—

"This disgusting exhibition of savage manners is at least perfectly in keeping with the other entertainments of the evening!"

"It is, indeed!" rejoined the marquise; "and my dear uncle will probably have lost the most amusing part of the performances!"

"M. de Montbron!" cried Adrienne, quickly, and with a degree of bitterness she could scarcely restrain. "True, he will be sorry he did not witness the whole. I long for his coming. Is it not to him I am indebted for the delightful evening I am passing?"

Possibly Madame de Morinval might have remarked the cutting irony which marked the words and looks of Adrienne while she sought in vain to repress their outward demonstration, if, all of a sudden, a deep, prolonged, and terrific roaring had not attracted her attention, as well as that of the whole audience, who, as we have already said, felt very little interest in the preparatory scenes which were to bring along the appearance of Morok, the universal hero! All eyes were instantaneously turned towards the cavern, situated on the left side of the stage, and immediately beneath the box occupied by Mademoiselle de Cardoville and her friends, while a thrill of intense curiosity pervaded the audience.

A second roaring, even louder, deeper, and apparently more angry than the former, issued this time from the subterranean abode, whose opening was concealed by artificial brushwood, easily removed. At this determined roar, the Englishman stood up in his narrow box, stretched himself out as far as he could, and began to rub his hands with considerable animation, then remained completely immovable, his large round eyes fixed and gleaming with anticipated triumph, never once removing their ardent gaze from the entrance of the cavern.

At these ferocious roarings, Djalma had also started, in spite of all the excitement of love, jealousy, and hatred, to which he was a prey. The sight of this forest, and the howls of the panther, caused in him a deep emotion, by again awakening his remembrances of his country, and those deadly hunts, which, like war, have such terrible excitement in them. If he had suddenly heard the darions and gongs of his father's army sound the attack, he could not have been stirred up with wilder emotion! Soon low growls, like the distant thunder, almost drowned the low, hoarse cries of the panther: the lion and tiger, Judas and Cain, replied from their cages at the lower end of the theatre. At this fearful concert, with which his ears had been so often struck in the midst of the solitudes of India, when he was out either in the chase or war, Djalma's blood boiled in his veins; his eyes sparkled with savage ardour, whilst, with his two hands grasping the edge of the box, his whole frame quivered with convulsive thrill. The audience, Adrienne, no longer existed for him. He was in a forest of his native land, and he scented the tiger.

At this moment, his fine features betrayed a feeling so intrepid and fierce, that Rose-Pompon gazed at him with a sort of fright, mingled with passionate admiration. For the first time, perhaps, in her life, her lovely blue eyes, usually so mirthful and mischievous, betrayed a serious emotion. She could not account to herself for what she felt. Her heart was oppressed, and palpitated violently, as if some misfortune were about to happen.

Yielding to an impulse of involuntary fear, she grasped Djalma's arm, saying,—

“Do not look at the cavern in that manner, you quite frighten me!”

The prince did not hear her.

“Oh! there he is! there he is!” murmured the crowd, with almost one voice.

Morok appeared at the back of the stage.

Morok, dressed as we have described him, carried now a bow and a long quiver full of arrows. He descended the sham rocks, slowly in the path, which sloped gradually down towards the middle stage, stopping from time to time, and pretending to listen; then again advancing with the utmost circumspection.

Whilst he was looking first on one side and then on the other, his eyes (involuntarily, no doubt) met the two staring green orbs of the Englishman, whose box was so near the cavern.

The features of the brute-tamer then suddenly contracted so fearfully, that Madame de Morinval, who was examining him very closely by the aid of an excellent lorgnette, said suddenly to Adrienne,—

“My dear, the man's afraid: some misfortune will happen to him!”

“What misfortune can happen?” replied Adrienne, with a bitter smile — “misfortune in the midst of so brilliant, so gay, and so animated a crowd — misfortune — and here this evening? Oh! my dear Julie, don't think of such a thing; it is in the shade and in solitude that misfortunes come, but never in the midst of a joyous assembly thus brilliantly illuminated.”

"Heavens! Adrienne, take care!" exclaimed the marquise, unable to repress a cry of alarm, and seizing Mademoiselle de Cardoville's arm, as if to draw her towards herself. "Do you see it?"

And, with trembling hand, the marquise pointed to the opening in the cave.

Adrienne bent her head forwards quickly, and looked at the cavern.

"Take care!—do not stoop so forward," she said to Adrienne.

"You are quite silly to be so frightened, my dear," said the marquis to his wife, "the panther is very securely fastened; and if he were to break his chain, which is very improbable, we shall be here out of his reach."

An increasing clamour of curiosity arose amongst the audience, and all eyes were fixed on the cave with the deepest interest.

Between the artificial bushes, which she dashed aside suddenly with her broad breast, the black panther suddenly appeared; twice she thrust forward her flat head, lighted up with yellow and flaming eyes; then opening her red throat, she emitted another roar, which developed her double row of formidable fangs.

A double iron-chain, and a collar also of iron, painted black, mingling with her ebony skin and the darkness of the cavern, the illusion was complete, and the terrible beast seemed perfectly free in her den.

"Ladies," said the marquis, suddenly, "look at the Indians; their emotion is really superb."

In fact, at the sight of the panther, the fierce ardour of Djalma had reached its height, his eyes glistened to their pearly orbits, like two black diamonds, his upper lip curled convulsively, and, with an expression of animal ferocity, as if he had been in a violent paroxysm of rage.

Faringhea, then leaning on the edge of the box, was also a prey to deep emotion, caused by singular chance. "This black panther, of so rare a species," thought he, "which I see here, in Paris, on a stage, must be that which the Malay (the Thug or Strangler, who had tattooed Djalma at Java, whilst he was asleep) carried off from its den, when it was a very small cub, and sold to an European captain. The power of Bohwanie is every where," added the Thug, in his sanguinary superstition.

"Don't you think," repeated the marquis, addressing Adrienne, "that these Indians are superb to see as they now are?"

"Perhaps they have been present at a similar hunt in their own country," said Adrienne, as if she sought to summon up and brave all that was cruel in her recollections.

"Adrienne," said the marquise to Mademoiselle de Cardoville, with a voice of agitation, "now that the beast-tamer is so near us, is not his face fearful to look at? I tell you the man is afraid."

"The fact is," added the marquis, in a serious tone, "his paleness is quite frightful, and seems to increase every moment as he comes nearer to this side; and they say that, if he loses his presence of mind for a moment, he incurs the greatest peril."

"Ah! how horrible that would be," exclaimed the marquis, addressing Adrienne, "if he were wounded here, under our very eyes!"

"Do people die of a wound?" asked Adrienne of the marchioness, with an accent of such cold indifference, that the young lady looked at Mademoiselle de Cardoville with surprise, and replied,—

“Really, my dear, that is a very inhuman speech of yours!”

“Is it? then it must be the atmosphere in which we are that acts upon me,” said the young lady, with a cold smile.

“See, see, the beast-tamer is about to fire off an arrow at the panther!” said the marquis, suddenly, “and then I dare say he will feign the personal struggle.”

Morok was at this instant in the front of the stage, and must cross it to reach the opening of the den. He paused for a moment, adjusted an arrow to the string of his bow, knelt behind a piece of rock, and took steady aim; then the arrow whistled, and was lost in the depth of the cavern, into which the panther had retreated, after having shewn his menacing front for a moment.

Scarcely had the arrow been shot, when La Mort, purposely provoked by Goliath, who was invisible, uttered a roar of rage, as if she had been hit.

Morok's pantomime became very expressive, and he expressed such joy at having wounded the savage brute, that shouts of applause echoed around the vast theatre. Then casting from him his bow, he drew his poniard from his belt, placed it between his teeth, and began to crawl on his hands and knees, as if he would surprise the wounded panther in her cave.

To render the illusion more perfect, La Mort, again aroused by Goliath, who struck her with an iron rod, roared tremendously from the depths of her den.

The dark aspect of the forest, scarcely lighted up by the red lights, had such an impressive effect, the howlings of the infuriated panther, the gestures, attitude, and countenance of Morok were so imprinted with terror, that the auditory, attentive and excited, remained in the deepest silence. All respiration appeared suspended, and it would seem a sensation of alarm had seized all the spectators, as if they were anticipating some horrible event.

What rendered Morok's pantomime so really appalling was, that as he gradually approached the den, he at the same time drew near to the Englishman's box. Despite himself the beast-tamer, fascinated by his fear, could not take his gaze off the round green eyes of this man, and it would seem as if each of the sudden motions he made in crawling along was responsive to a shock of magnetic attraction caused by the fixed stare of the sinister better; and thus, the nearer Morok approached him the more disturbed and livid did his features become.

Again, at the sight of this pantomime, which was no longer feigned but the real expression of dread, the deep and throbbing silence which pervaded the auditory was interrupted by acclamations and shouts, to which were added the roarings of the panther and the low and remote growls of the lion and tiger.

The Englishman leaning almost out of his box, his lips curling with his sardonic smile, his large eyes steadfastly fixed, he was breathless and intensely excited. The perspiration streamed down his bald red forehead, as if he had really given out an incredible amount of magnetic power to attract Morok whom he now saw at the very orifice of the cavern.

The moment was decisive. Curled up and gathered together as it were, with his poniard in his hand, watching with gesture and with eye every movement of La Mort, who roaring, irritated, and opening her enormous throat, seemed determined to defend the entrance to her den, whilst Morok watched the moment when he could rush upon her.

There is such a fascination in danger, that Adrienne in spite of herself partook of the deep feeling of curiosity mingled with affright which pervaded all the palpitating spectators, and leaning forwards, like the marquise, and looking fixedly at the scene of appalling interest, the young girl held mechanically in her hands her Indian bouquet which she had still preserved.

Suddenly Morok uttered a savage shout and threw himself on La Mort, who responded to his cry by a fierce roar, and precipitated herself on her master with such an agony of desperation that Adrienne, dreadfully alarmed at seeing the man, as she believed, lost, fell back in her chair, hiding her features with both her hands.

Her bouquet fell on the stage, and rolled into the den where Morok and the panther were fiercely struggling.

As rapid as lightning, as supple and agile as a tiger, yielding to the influence of his love and the savage excitement aroused within him by the roarings of the panther, Djalma was on the stage at a bound, and, drawing his poniard, dashed into the cavern to obtain Adrienne's bouquet. At this moment a fearful cry burst from the wounded Morok calling for help. The panther, more infuriated at the sight of Djalma, made a desperate effort to break her chain, which, unable to effect, she stood up on her hind legs in order to clutch Djalma at that moment within reach of her tremendous claws. To bend his head, throw himself on his knees, and at the same time to thrust his poniard twice into her belly with the rapidity of lightning, was Djalma's mode of escaping certain death. The panther roared, and fell on her side with all her weight on the prince; and, for the moment, whilst her dreadful spasmodic agony endured, nothing was seen but a confused and heaving mass of black limbs, and white and blood-stained garments. Then Djalma arose pale, bleeding, wounded, and placing his foot on the carcass of the slain panther, his eye sparkling with savage fire, he held up the bouquet of Adrienne, and cast on her a look which told his impassioned love.

At this moment it was that Adrienne's senses utterly forsook her; for until then a superhuman courage had enabled her to gaze on the fearful progress of this deadly struggle.

PART X.

THE COUNCIL.

CHAPTER LI.

THE TRAVELLER.

It is night.

The moon is shining, the stars scintillate in the midst of the sky with melancholy serenity, the fierce whistlings of the north wind, that unpropitious, dry, icy blast, cross, meet, and burst in violent shocks, and, with their cutting and harsh gusts, sweep the heights of Montmartre.

On the most elevated point of this hill a man is standing. His tall shadow is projected over the stony soil brightened by the moon.

This traveller contemplates the immense city spread beneath his feet.

PARIS, whose dark outline presents its towers, its cupolas, its domes, its steeples, in the blue clearness of the horizon, whilst from out the midst of this ocean of stones there arises a luminous vapour which reddens the starry azure of the zenith.

It is the distant light of a thousand fires which, in the evening, the hour of pleasure, so joyously light up the noisy capital.

"No," said the traveller, "it will not be; the Lord doth not will it.

"Twice hath been enough.

"Five centuries since, and the all-avenging hand of the Most High drove me from the farthestmost parts of Asia hither. A solitary traveller, I had left behind me more mourning, more despair, more disasters, more deaths, than had the innumerable armies of a hundred devastating conquerors. I entered this city, and it was also decimated.

"Two centuries since, and that inexorable hand which conducts me throughout and over the world, also impelled me hither, and this time as the other, that scourge, which the All-Powerful hath from all time attached to my footsteps, hath ravaged this city, first assailing my brethren already so sorely spent by toil and misery.

"Yes, my brethren, the brethren of me the artisan of Jerusalem, the artisan accursed of the Lord, who, in my person, hath cursed the race of workmen, a race always suffering, always destitute, always slaves, and who, as we march, march without pause or rest, without reward or hope, until all—men, women, children, and old folk—die beneath a yoke of iron—a homicidal yoke which others in their turn take up, and which workmen, from age to age, bear on their obedient and overladen shoulders.

"And, now for the third time in five centuries, I reach the highest point of one of the hills which top this city.

"And perchance with me I bring fear, and desolation, and death.

"And this city, intoxicated in the whirl of its pleasures, and its nocturnal rejoicings, knows not,—ah! knows not that I am at its gates!

"But, no, no, my presence betokeneth no new calamity.

"The Lord, in His inscrutable decrees, hath led me hither through France, making me in my route avoid even the humblest hamlet, and thus no funereal knell hath marked my progress.

"And then the spectre hath left me.

"This livid and green spectre and its deep and blood-shot eyes, when I trode the soil of France its moist and ice-cold hand relinquished mine—it vanished.

"And still—I feel—that—that—the atmosphere of death is still around me.

"These piercing blasts of the ill-boding wind leave me not; but, enveloping me in their stormy gusts, seem with their poisoned breath to propagate this scourge.

"Doubtless the anger of the Lord is appeased.

"Perchance my presence here is a menace which those whom it should intimidate will be made conscious of.

"Yes; for otherwise HE will, on the contrary, strike a blow of still more fearful sound, by casting all at once terror and death into the inmost heart of the country—into the bosom of this vast city.

"Oh, no—no! Have mercy, Lord!

"No; He will not condemn me to this fresh punishment.

"Alas, in this city my brethren are more numerous and more miserable than elsewhere!

"And it is I—I—who bring them death!

"No, the Lord will have pity! For, alas, the seven descendants of my sister are at length assembled in this city!

"And is it I who shall bring them death?

"Death, instead of the instant succour which they require?

"For this woman, who, like me, wandereth from one end of the world to the other, after having once again broken the snares of their enemies—this woman, who also pursueth her eternal journey——

“In vain hath she foreseen that again fresh misfortunes menace those who belong to me by my sister’s blood.

“The invisible hand which impelleth me driveth before me the wandering woman.

“Perpetually urged forwards by the irresistible whirlwind, in vain hath she cried, when, beseeching, she was compelled to abandon those of my blood,—

“‘At least, O Lord, let me finish my task!’

“‘ONWARDS!!!’

“‘But a few days, for pity’s sake—a few days only!’

“‘ONWARDS!!!’

“‘I leave those I would protect on the brink of an abyss.’

“‘ONWARDS!—ONWARDS!!!’

“And the errant star hath again shot forth on its eternal route.

“And her voice hath traversed space, and hath called on me to succour mine own.

“When her voice reached unto me, I perceived that the offspring of my sister were still exposed to fearful perils. These perils increase hourly.

“Oh, say, Lord, say, shall the children of my sister escape that fatality which, for so many ages, hath weighed down my race?

“Wilt Thou pardon me in them? Wilt Thou punish me in them?

“Ah, grant that they may obey the last wishes of their ancestor!

“Grant that they may unite their charitable hearts, their vast power, their fine understandings, their enormous wealth!

“So will they work for the future happiness of mankind. Thus, perchance, may they ransom me from eternal punishment!

“Those words of the Man-God, ‘LOVE ONE ANOTHER!’ will be their sole end—their sole means.

“United by these all-potent words, they will struggle, they will conquer those false priests who have laughed to scorn the precepts of love, peace, and hope of the Man-God, for devices filled with hatred, violence, and despair.

“These false priests, who, suborned by the powerful and the happy of this world—their accomplices from all time—instead of asking here below for some small portion of happiness for my suffering brethren, who groan for ages, dare, in Thy name, Lord, to say that the poor are for ever doomed to the tortures of this world, and that the desire, or even the hope, of diminished suffering on this earth, is a crime in Thy eyes, because Thy will is the happiness of the minority—the misery of nearly all human-kind. Oh, blasphemy ! Is it not the contrary of these murderous assertions that is worthy of Thy divine will ?

“For mercy’s sake hear me, Lord ! Deliver from their enemies the descendants of my sister—from the mechanic to the king’s son. Do not Thou allow to be destroyed the germ of an association so powerful, so promising, and which, by Thy grace, may be hereafter recognised amongst the benefactors to humanity.

“Permit me, Lord, to unite them, since they are separated—to defend them, since they are assailed. Let me convey hope to those who have hope no longer, to inspire courage to those who are depressed, to raise those who are menaced with falling, and to sustain those who are progressing in good.

“And, perchance, their struggles, their devotion, their virtues, their griefs, may expiate my crime—mine, whom misfortune, misfortune alone, had rendered unjust and wicked.

“Lord, since Thy all-powerful hand hath conducted me hither for an end of which I am unconscious, put off at length Thine anger—let me not be the instrument of Thy vengeance !

“Enough of mourning on the earth ! For two years Thy creatures fall by millions at my footsteps.

“The world is decimated ; a veil of mourning hath covered the whole universe.

“From Asia to the ices of the pole I have marched, and there hath been death.

“Dost Thou not hear, Lord, the lengthened sob which ariseth from earth towards Thee ?

“Mercy for all, and for me !

“Let me for one day—for one day only—bring together the descendants of my sister, and they are saved !”

And saying these words, the traveller fell on his knees, and raised to heaven his supplicating hands.

Suddenly the wind blew with additional violence ; its shrill wailings burst forth into a storm.

The traveller shuddered. With an agonised accent he exclaimed,—

“Lord, the death-wind bloweth with rage. It seems as though its whirlwind impelled me. Lord, dost Thou then reject my prayer ?

“The spectre !—oh, the spectre ! ’Tis here—’tis here !—again—again ! Its green and sickly visage is working with convulsive agitation—its red eyes roll in their sockets ! Begone !—avaunt !—away ! Its hand—oh, its icy, icy hand—hath clutched mine ! Mercy, Lord, mercy !”

“ONWARDS !”

"Oh, Lord, this scourge — this fearful scourge — again to conduct it to this city! My brethren will be the first to perish! They so miserable! Mercy!"

"ONWARDS!"

"And the descendants of my sister! Mercy — oh, mercy!"

"ONWARDS!"

"O Lord, have mercy! I can no longer keep my footing here. The spectre drags me towards the declivity of the hill! My step is as rapid as the death-wind which drives me forward. Already I see the walls of the city. Oh, mercy, Lord, mercy, for the descendants of my sister! Spare them! Grant that I be not their executioner, and that they may triumph over their enemies!"

"ONWARDS! — ONWARDS!"

"The ground flies from beneath my tread. Already I am at the gate of the city — oh, already, Lord! Yet is there time. Oh, mercy for this sleeping city! Let it not suddenly awake with cries of fear, despair, and death! Lord, I touch the very threshold of its gate. Thou wilt have it so, then? It is decreed! Paris, the scourge, the pest, is in thy bosom! Ah, cursed — for ever cursed!"

"ONWARDS! — ONWARDS! — ONWARDS!!!"*

CHAPTER LII.

THE COLLATION.

THE day after the ominous traveller, descending the heights of Montmartre, had entered Paris, there was a vast stir in the Hôtel de Saint-Dizier.

Although it was scarcely noon, the princess, without being full-dressed (she had too much good taste for that), was still attired with more than usual care. Her light hair, instead of being simply arranged in bandeaux, was curled and crépée, which suited her full and florid features extremely well; her cap was ornamented with new pink ribands; and Madame de Saint-Dizier appeared so slim in her grey merino gown, one might suppose that Madame Grivois must have required some assistance and the efforts of another of the princess's maids to attempt and succeed in this remarkable reduction of the full figure of their mistress.

* In 1346 the famous black pest ravaged the earth. It presented the same symptoms as the cholera, and the same inexplicable phenomenon as to its progressive and peculiar advances in a prescribed route. In 1660 another and similar epidemic again decimated the globe.

It is well known that the cholera declared itself in Paris by interrupting (if we may use the phrase) its progressive march with one enormous and inexplicable bound. And, it may be remembered also, that the north-east wind prevailed constantly during the most terrible ravages of the cholera.

We will presently explain the actual cause of this slight return to mundane coquetry.

The princess, followed by Madame Grivois, her housekeeper, gave her final instructions respecting some preparations which were making in a large saloon, in the midst of which was a large round table, covered with a crimson velvet cloth and surrounded by several chairs, in the midst of which was a gilt arm-chair, which distinctly marked out the place of honour.

In one of the angles of the saloon, not far from the fire-place, in which an excellent fire was burning, there was a sort of temporary sideboard, on which were the varied elements of a most delicate and exquisite collation. On silver plates was a pyramid of sandwiches of carps' roes cured in anchovy, preserved tunny minced with truffles of Périgord (it was in Lent); and in another place, in silver dishes, kept warm over spirit-lamps, were bouchées de queues of cray-fish of the Meuse in clotted cream, smoking in their raised puff paste, light and glazed, seeming capable of rivalling in succulence the small patties of the Marennes oysters, stewed in Madeira, and sturgeon minced and seasoned most delicately with all-spice.

Besides these serious dishes were lighter productions,—small biscuits with sliced pine-apple, puffs of strawberries (very scarce at this season), orange jellies served in the entire rind of the fruit, artistically cut for that purpose; rubies and topazes, stimulated by the wines of Bordeaux, Madeira, and Alicant, sparkled in large crystal decanters, whilst Champagne and two carafes of Sèvres porcelain filled, one with coffee à la crème, and the other with chocolate à la vanille ambrée, were almost become like ices, plunged as they were in a large cooler of sculptured silver filled with ice.

But what gave to this dainty collation a singularly Apostolic and Romish character, were certain productions religiously elaborated. There were charming little Calvaries of apricot tartlets, sacerdotal mitres in sweetmeats, episcopal crosses in marchpane, to which the princess had added, with an attention full of delicacy, a small cardinal's hat in cherry-sugar, adorned with falling cords made of spun sugar. The most important piece of these Catholic sweetmeats, the chef-d'œuvre of the head cook of Madame de Saint-Dizier, was a superb crucifix of angelica, with its crown of preserved barbaries.*

Such are the strange profanations at which (and with reason) even the least really pious persons are disgusted. But from the infamous juggle of the tunic of Treves to the unblushing jest of the shrine at Argenteuil, pious persons like the Princess de Saint-Dizier seem to try how absurd they can make traditions worthy of respect.

After having cast a very satisfactory glance over the collation thus prepared, Madame de Saint-Dizier said to Madame Grivois, pointing to the gilt arm-chair, which seemed destined for the president of this meeting,—

* A person, whose word may be relied on, informed us that he was present at a dinner at the house of a very eminent prelate, when he saw a similar exhibition at dessert, which caused him to say to the prelate in question, "I thought, monseigneur, that we ate the Saviour's body in two forms (sous les deux espèces), but not in angelica (en angélique)?" We should add that this Apostolic sweetmeatry was not the prelate's own doing, but resulted from the somewhat exaggerated Catholicism of a pious lady who had great authority in the house of monseigneur.

"Have they placed my chancelière* under the table for his eminence's feet? He always complains of cold."

"Yes, madame," said Madame Grivois, after having looked under the table, "the chancelière is there."

"Desire them to fill a brazen bowl with boiling water, in case his eminence should not find the chancelière sufficient to warm his feet."

"Yes, madame."

"Throw some more wood on the fire."

"But, madame, it is really burning already so fiercely, pray look; and then, if his eminence is always cold, Monseigneur the Bishop de Halfagen is always too warm—he is continually in a perspiration."

The princess shrugged her shoulders, and said to Madame Grivois, "Is not his Eminence Monseigneur the Cardinal de Malipieri the superior of Monseigneur the Bishop de Halfagen?"

"Yes, madame."

"Well, then, according to the hierarchy, it is monseigneur to suffer from the heat, and not his eminence who is to suffer from the cold, therefore do as I desire you, and add wood to the fire. Besides, nothing is more plain,—his eminence is Italian, whilst monseigneur belongs to the north of Belgium; and it is, therefore, quite natural that they should be habituated to different climates."

"As you wish, madame," said Madame Grivois, putting two enormous logs on the fire; "but the heat of this room is enough to suffocate monseigneur the bishop."

"Eh! and I, too, find it overpoweringly hot here; but our holy religion teaches us sacrifice and mortification!" said the princess, with a touching expression of devotion.

We may now guess the cause of the somewhat coquettish toilette of the Princess de Saint-Dizier, who was about to receive with all ceremony the prelates who, connected with the Père d'Aigrigny and other dignitaries of the church, had already held at the princess's hôtel a council on a small scale.

A bride of twenty who gives her first ball, an emancipated minor who gives his first bachelor's dinner, a woman of genius who for the first time reads aloud her first unpublished work, are not more happy, more proud, and at the same time more anxiously eager about their guests than was Madame de Saint-Dizier about her prelates.

To see most important interests canvassed and debated in her house and in her presence, to hear personages of high intellect ask her opinion as to certain practical matters relative to influences over certain female associations, was enough to make the princess die with proud satisfaction, for their eminences and their highnesses thus stamped with authority for ever her pretension to be considered as a holy mother of the church, and it was, therefore, in honour of these indigenous or exotic prelates that she had displayed a thousand coaxing attentions and coquettish cares.

Nothing could be more logical, moreover, than the successive transformations of this heartless woman, who so dearly doted on, so passionately adored, intrigue and the rule of the coterie. She had, with her progress in years, naturally advanced from the intrigue amorous to the intrigue political, and from the intrigue political to the intrigue religious.

* A fur mat enclosed in leather.

At the moment when Madame de Saint-Dizier was terminating the inspection of her preparations, a noise of carriages was heard in the courtyard of the hôtel which announced the arrival of the personages she expected, and these individuals were assuredly of the highest rank, for, contrary to all usage, she went to receive them at the door of her first salon.

They were the Cardinal Malipieri, who was always cold, and the Belgian Bishop de Halfagen, who was always hot, accompanied by Père d'Aigrigny.

The Roman cardinal was a tall man, rather bony than thin, with a haughty and crafty countenance, with yellow and puffed cheeks; he squinted considerably, and his black eyes were deeply marked with a brown circle. The Belgian bishop was a little, short, thickset man, with a prominent stomach, apoplectic appearance, a cautious air, and a hand dimpled, soft, and plump.

The party soon assembled in the large salon, and whilst the cardinal placed himself close to the fire-place, the bishop began to perspire and puff, glancing from time to time at the iced chocolate and coffee, which he relied on as his aids in supporting the ardour of this artificial dog-star.

The Père d'Aigrigny, coming up to the princess, said to her in a low voice,—

“Will you give orders that the Abbé Gabriel de Rennepont is to be admitted when he calls and asks for you?”

“Is the young priest here, then?” inquired the princess, with much surprise.

“Yes, since the day before yesterday, we had him summoned to Paris by his superiors. You shall know all. As to Rodin, Madame Grivois will go, as she did the other day, and let him in by the little door on the private staircase.”

“Will he come to-day?”

“He has some very important disclosures to make to us. He has desired that Monseigneur the Cardinal, and Monseigneur the Bishop, should be present at the interview, for they have been informed of every thing, at Rome, by the Father-General, in their quality of affiliés.”

The princess rang, gave her orders, and returning to the cardinal, said to him, in an accent of most earnest solicitude,—

“Does your eminence begin to feel any warmer? Will your eminence have a bowl of boiling water under your feet? Will your eminence like that the fire should be increased?”

At this, the Belgian bishop, who was wiping his perspiring brow, heaved a despairing sigh.

“A thousand thanks, princess,” replied the cardinal to Madame de Saint-Dizier, in very good French, with a horrid Italian accent. “I am really overpowered by so much attention.”

“Will not monseigneur take any thing?” said the princess to the bishop, looking towards the buffet.

“If you will allow me, princess, I will take a little café à la glace.”

THE COLLATION.

And the prelate made a prudent circuit, in order to reach the collation without approaching the fire-place.

"Will not your eminence take one of these small oyster-patties, they are quite warm?" said the princess.

"I know them well, madame," replied the cardinal, with the air of a gourmand, "they are so exquisite there is no resisting them."

"What wine shall I have the honour of offering to your eminence?" said the princess, most graciously.

"A little Bordeaux, madame, if you will be so kind."

And as the Père d'Aigrigny was about to pour the wine out for the cardinal, the princess contended with him for this honour.

"Your reverence will, I trust, approve," said the Père d'Aigrigny to the cardinal, whilst the latter was seriously devoting himself to the little oyster-patties, "that I did not think it necessary to summon to-day Monseigneur the Bishop de Mogador, nor Monseigneur the Archbishop de Nanterre, nor our Holy Mother Perpétue, the superior of the Convent de Sainte-Marie. The conversation we are about to have with his reverence the Père Rodin and the Abbé Gabriel being exclusively private and confidential."

"Our dear father has acted with sound discretion," said the cardinal; "for although, in its possible consequences, this Rennepont affair is deeply interesting to all the Apostolical and Romish Church, yet there are certain things which it is requisite to keep secret."

"Then I will avail myself of this opportunity of thanking your eminence, once again, for having deigned to make an exception in favour of a very obscure and very humble servant of the Church," said the princess, making a very respectful and lowly reverence to the cardinal.

"It was just and due, princess," replied the cardinal, bowing after he had deposited his empty glass on the table. "We know how much the Church owes you for the salutary impulse you give to the religious charities of which you are the patroness."

"As to that, your eminence may be certain that I should refuse all succour to the indigent applicant who is not duly entitled by a note of confession."

"And it is only thus, madame," replied the cardinal, allowing himself at the moment to be tempted by the appetizing appearance of a bouchée aux queues d'écrevisse, "it is only thus that charity is rightly evinced. I care little if impiety is hungry—piety is quite a different thing, quite;" and the prelate swallowed the bouchée with great relish. "Besides," he added, "we know, also, with what ardent zeal you so inexorably pursue the impious and rebellious against the authority of our Holy Father."

"Your eminence may be convinced that I am Roman in heart, soul, and conviction. I make no difference between a Gallican and a Turk," said the princess, bravely.

"Madame la Princesse is right," observed the Belgian bishop. "I will say more, a Gallican ought to be more hateful to the Church than a pagan; and I am, on this subject, of the opinion of Louis XIV. Some one asked him a favour for some man of his court. 'Never,' said the great king; 'this man is a Jansenist.' 'He, sire! he is an Atheist.' 'That's a different thing,' said the king, 'and I will grant the favour.'"

This little episcopal pleasantry caused considerable laughter; after which Père d'Aigrigny continued seriously to address the cardinal,—

"Unfortunately, as I shall presently shew your eminence, in reference to the Abbé Gabriel, if he were not watched closely, the lower clergy would be infected with Gallicanism and ideas of rebellion against what they term the despotism of the bishops."

"To obviate that," replied the cardinal, harshly, "the bishops must redouble their severity, and never forget that they were Romans before they were Frenchmen; for in France they represent Rome, the Holy Father, and the interests of the Church, as an ambassador represents, in a foreign land, his country, his master, and the interests of his nation."

"That is undeniably true," said the Abbé d'Aigrigny. "So let us hope that, thanks to the vigorous impulse which your eminence gives to the episcopate, we shall at length obtain the power of imparting instruction. Then, instead of young Frenchmen infected with philosophy and absurd patriotism, we shall have good, obedient, well-disciplined Roman Catholics, who will become thus the respected subjects of our Holy Father."

"And so, in a given time," added the Belgian bishop, with a smile, "if our Holy Father was willing, I suppose, to free the catholics of France from their obedience to the existing temporal power, he might, on recognising some other power, assure to it a considerable and perfectly constituted catholic party."

So saying, the bishop again wiped his brow, and sought a little Siberia from the depths of one of the vessels filled with iced chocolate.

"Moreover, a power always shews itself grateful for such a gift," said the princess, smiling in her turn; "and then concedes great immunities to the Church."

"And thus the Church resumes the place it ought to occupy, and which, unfortunately, it no longer occupies in France in these times of impiety and anarchy," said the cardinal. "Fortunately, in my way hither, I have seen a good many prelates, whose lukewarmness I have reproved, and whose zeal I have rekindled; enjoining them, in the name of the Holy Father, to attack openly and boldly the liberty of the press and the freedom of worships, although they are recognised by abominable revolutionary laws."

"Alas! your eminence has not then retreated in the face of these terrible dangers—before the cruel martyrdoms to which our prelates will be exposed in obeying you?" said the princess, gaily. "And those redoubtable appeals against abuses; if your eminence should reside in France, you would assail the laws of the country, as they are called by the race of lawyers and members of Parliament. Lack! what a terrible affair! The Council of State would declare that there was an abuse in your mandate. Monseigneur, there would be an abuse! Your eminence will understand how frightful a thing it is for a prince of the Church, when seated on his pontifical throne, surrounded by his dignitaries and his chapter, to hear, at a distance, some dozen of atheistical bureaucrats, in black and blue livery, crying at the top of their lungs, from the falsetto to the bass,—‘There is an abuse ! there is an abuse !’ Really, if there be any abuse at all, it is the abuse of the ridiculous with such people.”

This pleasantry on the part of the princess was hailed with general hilarity.

The Belgian bishop next spoke,—

“I find that these fierce defenders of the laws, whilst they play the braggadocio, act with a perfectly Christian humility. A prelate rudely reproves their impiety, and they modestly reply, whilst they make a lowly reverence, ‘Ah, monseigneur, there is an abuse !’”

Fresh bursts of laughter hailed this pleasantry.

“We must let them amuse themselves with these innocent cries of scholars annoyed by the sharp ferula of the master,” said the cardinal, smiling. “We shall be always amongst them in spite of themselves, and against themselves. In the first place, because we consider their eternal welfare more than they themselves do ; and, then, because the powers that be will always have need of us to give them weight, and to bridle the populace. Moreover, whilst the advocates and parliamentary men, and university atheists, utter cries of impotent hatred and malice, really Christian souls come into collision, and unite against impiety. In my way through Lyons I was deeply affected. Ah ! that is a really Roman city, brotherhoods, penitents, all kinds of charities—nothing is wanting ; and, what is better than all, there is a donation to the clergy yearly of not less than three hundred thousand crowns (36,000*l.*). Ah ! Lyons is the worthy capital of catholic France. Three hundred thousand crowns, a donation, that’s the way to choke impiety ! Three hundred thousand crowns a-year ! What will the philosophers say to that ?”

“Unfortunately, monseigneur,” replied the Père d’Aigrigny, “all the cities of France do not resemble Lyons. I must even inform your eminence, that a very grave fact is manifest. Some number of the lower clergy pretend to make common cause with the populace, whose poverty and privations they share, and are ready to protest, in the name of evangelical equality, against what they call the aristocratic despotism of the bishops.”

“If it were possible they could be guilty of such audacity,” cried the cardinal, “there would be no species of interdiction, no punishment too severe to inflict for such rebellious conduct.”

“They have even gone beyond this conduct, daring as it may seem to your eminence. Some among them have even ventured to get up a schism, and to demand that the French Church should be entirely separated from that of Rome, under the pretext that Ultramontanism has perverted and corrupted the primitive purity of the doctrines of Christ. A young priest, who was first a missionary, then a country curate, named Gabriel de Rennepont, has made himself the centre of a species of Propaganda. He has assembled several of the clergy of the neighbouring parishes, and while recommending the most implicit obedience to their bishops so long as things remain as they now are in the existent hierarchy, he still exhorted them to avail themselves of their rights, as citizens of France, to accomplish legitimately what he is pleased to call the freedom of the lower clergy ; for,

according to his assertions, the priests of parishes are solely at the mercy of their bishops, who may place them under interdict, and deprive them of their means of subsistence, without power of appealing from their decision.”*

“Why, this young man must be a sort of Catholic Luther,” said the bishop.

And walking tiptoe towards the buffet, the pious and much-shocked prelate helped himself to a brimming glass of Madeira, into which he slowly dipped a marchpane formed in the shape of an episcopal cross.

Encouraged by this example, the cardinal, under pretext of warming his still cold feet, approached the fire, thought fit to present himself with a glass of rare old Malaga, which he gulped down with an air of profound meditation; after which he resumed,—

“Then it appears, that this said Abbé Gabriel sets himself up for a reformer? he must be an ambitious spirit. Pray is he likely to be dangerous?”

“Acting upon our advice, he has been so deemed by our superiors, who have ordered him to repair hither; he will be here directly, and I will briefly state to your eminence wherefore I have caused him to be summoned. But, previously, I wish to shew you some notes, which will explain and expose the dangerous turn of the Abbé Gabriel’s ideas. The following questions have been put to him in writing, touching several of his actions, and it is in consequence of the nature of his replies that his superiors have recalled him.”

So saying, the Abbé d’Aigrigny took from his pocket-book a paper, which he read aloud. It was as follows:—

“Question.—‘Is it true that you have performed the last solemn duties to an inhabitant of your parish, who, after having lived in a state of vile and hardened impenitence, finished his guilty career by committing suicide?’

“Reply of the Abbé Gabriel,—

“‘I did perform the last religious rites, because, by reason of his former sinful life, the unfortunate deceased had more need than other men of the prayers of the Church; and, during the night which followed his interment, I unceasingly supplicated the mercy of God for him.’

“Question.—‘Is it true that you refused certain vases of vermeil, and sundry other ornamental gifts, which certain of your parishioners, obeying the dictates of a pious zeal, wished to present to the church over which you preside?’

“Reply.—‘I refused the vermeil vases, and other decorative offerings, because the house of the Lord should be simple and unostentatious, in order that the faithful may ever be reminded that the divine Saviour was born in a stable; and I prevailed on the persons who were desirous of making such useless presents to the parish, rather to employ their

* An ecclesiastic, as honourable as honoured, has related to us the fact of a poor young parish priest, who, placed under an interdict by his bishop, without any assignable cause, and reduced almost to the last stage of want and misery, was compelled to go (of course concealing his sacred profession) as waiter at a café at Lille, in which establishment his brother was also similarly employed.

money in judicious acts of charity, assuring them it would go much further in promoting the glory of the Lord.' "

"Upon my word!" exclaimed the cardinal; "here we have a violent and intemperate denunciation against the decorating of our places of worship! This young priest is a highly dangerous person; but I pray you, my dear father, to continue your notes."

And excited by his zealous indignation, his eminence swallowed sundry strawberry-puffs with desperate eagerness.

D'Aigrigny thus resumed,—

"Question.—'Is it true that you have received into your vicarage, and nursed and tended, for several days, an inhabitant of the village, a Swiss by birth, and a member of the Protestant faith? Is it true that not only you used no efforts to convert him to the Catholic Apostolic and Romish religion, but that you carried your utter disregard of your duties so far as to bury this heretic in the consecrated ground appropriated for the reception of such as die in our holy communion?'

"Reply.—'A fellow-creature and a brother was without shelter,—his life had been passed in honest industry—too old to labour—he was attacked by severe illness—when almost in a dying state he was turned out of doors by a pitiless landlord, to whom he owed a twelve-month's rent. I received the worn-out old man into my house. I whispered peace and hope in the few last days of his life. The poor creature had known nothing but sorrow, hard labour, and privations all his life; but never, even up to his dying hour, did he murmur against his hard lot, but, humbly commending his soul to God, and reverentially kissing the blessed cross, his guileless and contented spirit resigned itself unto Him who gave it. I closed his eyes with the respect I would have shewn a monarch; myself committed him to the grave; and, notwithstanding he had died in the Protestant faith, I deemed him worthy of a place in our burial-ground.' "

"Better and better!" said the cardinal: "this is, indeed, tolerance of a most monstrous description, and a decided and horrible attack against a maxim which comprises the whole force of Catholicism, There is no salvation save for those within the pale of our Holy Church! "

"These things become so much the more serious, my lord," replied D'Aigrigny, "from the universal enthusiasm excited by the mildness, charity, and Christian devotion of the Abbé Gabriel; a feeling which is not confined to his own parish, but extends equally to the surrounding districts. The clergy of the neighbouring parishes have yielded to the general excitement, and, certainly, but for the extreme humility and moderation of the young priest, Gabriel, a very formidable schism would commence."

"But what is your motive," asked the prelate, "in bringing the Abbé Gabriel before us at the present moment?"

"In the first place, the position of the Abbé Gabriel is one of considerable complexity. Primarily as regards his being heir to the Rennepont family."

"But he has formally renounced his claims—has he not?" demanded the cardinal.

"He has, my lord; and this renunciation, at first invalid for want of due form, has been lately duly and legally secured, it must be admitted, by his own full and unhesitating consent, he having solemnly vowed, whatever might befall himself, to abandon all claims to the Rennepont property in favour of the company of Jesus. Nevertheless, his reverence, Father Rodin, suggested that it would perhaps be as well if your eminence would see the Abbé Gabriel, and, first pointing out to him that his superiors were about to recall him in disgrace, might offer him a distinguished position in Rome, we should probably succeed in inducing him to quit France, and thereby awaken in him those sentiments of ambition which, doubtless, merely slumber within him; for, as your eminence very judiciously observed, every reformer either is or should be ambitious."

"I approve of the suggestion," returned the cardinal, after a short pause; "with his rare qualifications, and the extreme influence he seems capable of acquiring over the minds of men, the Abbé Gabriel might easily arrive at considerable distinction in the Church, if he be docile; and if he be not, why, it is better for the safety of the Church he should be at Rome than here, for at Rome we have, as you are aware, my well-beloved brother, certain modes of compelling duty and obedience which, unfortunately, France does not possess."*

After a moment's reflection, the cardinal suddenly said to D'Aigrigny,—

"Since we are speaking of Rodin, tell me candidly what is your opinion of him?"

"Your eminence is aware of his great ability," said D'Aigrigny, with an air of mingled restraint and distrust. "Our reverend Father-General —"

"Has commissioned him to supersede you," said the cardinal. "I know that, the reverend Father-General told me of it in Rome; but, I want to have your opinion of the natural disposition of this Rodin. Do you consider that he is a person to repose unlimited confidence in?"

"He is, indeed, one of those self-contained, decided, secret, and impenetrable characters," answered D'Aigrigny, hesitatingly, "that it is really impossible to arrive at any certain conclusion respecting him."

"Do you believe him to be ambitious?" pursued the cardinal, after another pause. "Do you not think it probable he has other objects in what he does than the sole desire to promote the welfare and great glory of his Order? I tell you," continued the cardinal, significantly, "I have powerful reasons for putting the question to you."

"But," replied D'Aigrigny, not without mistrust—for between persons mutually suspicious of the other's good faith, it is ever requisite to proceed cautiously, "what does your eminence think respecting him, either from your own observation or in consequence of what you may have heard from the reverend Father-General?"

"Why, indeed, my impression is that if any sinister views are concealed beneath his great apparent devotion to his Order, it is needful they should be discovered at any price, for, with the powerful influence he has for some time past created for himself at Rome, and which I have discovered, he might one day, and that not far off, become really formidable."

* It is well known that, at the present day (1845), the Inquisition, with its imprisonment in pace, &c., still exists in Rome.

"And I," exclaimed D'Aigrigny, carried away by his jealousy of Rodin, "am entirely of the same opinion as your eminence, for I have occasionally observed in him flashes of ambition, as threatening as vast and unbounded, and, therefore, I will frankly say, since your eminence desires to know my inmost thoughts concerning him ——"

D'Aigrigny was unable to proceed, for at this moment, Madame Grivois, having first tapped at the door, half opened it, and made a sign to her mistress, who replied to her by an inclination of the head.

Madame Grivois then disappeared, and immediately afterwards Rodin entered the salon.

CHAPTER LIII.

THE BALANCE-SHEET.

AT the sight of Rodin, the two prelates and the Père d'Aigrigny rose spontaneously, so imposing was the real superiority of this man; whilst their countenances, but now contracted by mistrust and jealousy, suddenly expanded, and seemed to smile at the reverend Père with extreme deference; whilst the princess advanced several paces towards him.

Rodin, as usual, wretchedly clad, leaving on the soft carpet the muddy prints of his thick shoes, put down his umbrella in a corner, and approached the table, not with his accustomed humility, but with a deliberate tread; his head erect, his look assured, not only as if he felt himself amongst his own party, but as if he had the consciousness of ruling amongst them by the enlightenment of his understanding.

"We were speaking of your reverence, my very dear Père," said the cardinal, with excessive affability.

"Ah!" said Rodin, looking steadfastly at the prelate, "and what were you saying?"

"Why," said the Belgian bishop, wiping his forehead, "all the good one can say of your reverence."

"Will you not take something, my very dear Père?" said the princess to Rodin, and pointing to the splendid buffet.

"Thanks, madame; but I have had my radish this morning."

"My secretary, the Abbé Berlini, who was present at your morning meal, has edified me exceedingly on your reverence's frugality," said the prelate; "it is, indeed, worthy of an anchorite."

"Suppose we talk of business?" said Rodin, abruptly, and like a man used to control and take a lead in discussion.

"We are always delighted to hear you," said the prelate. "Your reverence appointed this day yourself to talk over and discuss this great Rennepont affair,—so great, indeed, that it is one of the main objects of my journey to France. For to sustain the interest of the most glorious company of Jesus, with which I have the honour to be affiliated, is to sustain the interests of Rome ; and I have promised the reverend Father-General that I will place myself entirely under your orders."

"I can only repeat what his eminence has said," added the bishop. "Quitting Rome together, our views and ideas are precisely similar."

"Assuredly," said Rodin, addressing himself to the cardinal ; "your eminence can serve our cause, and materially. I will presently shew you in what way." Then, addressing the princess, "I have sent to Dr. Baleinier to come here, madam ; for it will be right to instruct him on certain points."

"He will be admitted as usual," said the princess.

Since Rodin's arrival, Père d'Aigrigny had kept silence. He appeared to be deeply immersed in thought ; and, as if undergoing a severe internal struggle, at length he half rose from his seat, and said, in a soft voice, in which an expression of vexation was yet audible, addressing the prelate,—

"I have no intention of asking your eminence to be the judge between his reverence the Père Rodin and myself : our general has spoken, and I have obeyed. But, your eminence being about to return speedily to our superior, I could wish if you would so far favour me, that you would faithfully report the replies of his reverence the Père Rodin to certain questions."

The prelate bowed.

Rodin looked at the Père d'Aigrigny with an astonished air, and said to him, dryly,—

"It is already decided ; what is the use of any further questionings ?"

"Not with any desire or design of vindicating myself," replied the Père d'Aigrigny ; "but that the precise state of things may come before his eminence's eyes."

"Well, then, go on ; but pray do not let us have any useless waste of words," said Rodin, drawing out his large silver watch, which he looked at, and then added, "I must be at Saint-Sulpice at two o'clock."

"I will be as brief as possible," said Père d'Aigrigny, with repressed resentment ; and then, resuming, he addressed Rodin, "When your reverence thought proper to substitute your control to mine, blaming, too severely perhaps, the manner in which I had directed the interests which had been confided to me, those interests, I frankly confess, had been utterly compromised."

"Compromised !" interrupted Rodin, ironically ; "say, at once, destroyed ; for you ordered me to write to Rome, and say that all hope must now be renounced."

"That is the truth," said Père d'Aigrigny.

"Then it was a dying man given over—abandoned by the best physician," continued Rodin, with irony, "whom I have undertaken to restore to life. Go on."

And, thrusting his two hands in the pockets of his trousers, he looked the Père d'Aigrigny full in the face.

"Your reverence bitterly upbraided me," continued the Père d'Aigrigny, "but for having sought, by all possible means, to recover the property most shamefully pilfered from our company."

"All your casuists authorise you completely and properly," said the cardinal,—“the opinions are clear and decided, and you have the perfect right to recover, per fas aut nefas, property of which you have been traitorously despoiled.”

"Thus, then," continued the Père d'Aigrigny, "his highness the Père Rodin only reproached me with the military brutality of my means, their violence in dangerous discordance, as he remarked, with the manners of the times. True; but, in the first place, I was not in any way legally the object of any prosecution; in the next, but for a circumstance of unprecedented fatality, success must have crowned the measures I had pursued, however coarse and severe they might have been. Now, may I inquire of your reverence what you ——"

"What I have done more than you did?" said Rodin to Père d'Aigrigny, giving way to his insolent habit of interruption; "What I have done better than you? what steps I have pursued in the Renne-pont affair after I took it out of your hands, who had forsaken it in despair? Is that what you wish to know?"

"Precisely," said the Père d'Aigrigny, dryly.

"Well, then, I'll tell you," replied Rodin, in a sardonic tone; "as many great, clumsy, coarse things as you have done, so many small, childish, secret things have I done! Yes, I, who have dared to call myself a man of extended views, you cannot imagine the silly game I have been engaged in for the last six weeks."

"I should never have allowed myself to address such a reproach to your reverence, however much I might have deemed them merited," said the Père d'Aigrigny, with a bitter smile.

"A reproach?" said Rodin, shrugging his shoulders,—“a reproach? Your judgment has been decided upon. Do you know what I wrote of you six weeks ago? It was, 'The Père d'Aigrigny has excellent qualities, and will serve me materially' (from to-morrow I shall employ you most actively," said Rodin, parenthetically); 'but,' I added, 'he is not sufficiently great to know how to make himself occasionally little.' Do you understand?"

"Not very clearly," said Père d'Aigrigny, turning very red.

"So much the worse for you," continued Rodin; "for it proves I was correct. Well, then, since I must tell you; I have had wit enough to play the silliest game in the world for the last six weeks. Yes, such as you see me, I have played the amiable with a grisette; I have talked of progress, humanity, liberty, emancipation of women, with a young girl whose head is turned; I have talked of the great Napoleon and the Buonapartist mania with a worn-out old soldier; I have talked of the imperial glory, the humiliation of France, the hopes of the King of Rome, with a gallant man, a marshal of France, who, if he has a heart full of adoration for that stealer of crowns, who was considered a felon at St. Helena, has a head which is as hollow and empty as a trumpet. Blow into this brainless tube a few warlike or patriotic notes, and, lo! he has made fantasies, without knowing for whom, for what, or how. Ma foi! this is not all! I have talked over love-passages with a young, wild tiger. I tell you that it was really lamentable to see a man with some brains lower himself in the scale of humanity, as I have done; humble himself to collect, as I have done, the thousand and one small threads which belong to the ravelled skein of this intricate plot! A glorious sight, is it not, to see the spider spin his web so toilsomely,—fastening this one, altering that, letting out others? How interesting, to see the vile, small, black animal at his patient work! You shrug your shoulders! Be it so; but come back in two hours, and what do you see? the little black animal fully gorged, fed up to his throat, and in his web a dozen silly flies, so entangled, so fettered that the little black animal has only to choose at his pleasure the hour and moment for his feeding."

As he said these words, Rodin smiled singularly; his eyes, usually half hidden by his flaccid eyelids, were widely distended, and seemed to glow with unusual ardour. The Jesuit had felt within him for some moments a sort of feverish excitement, which he attributed to the struggle he was maintaining before those eminent personages who were already under the influence of his original and emphatic mode of discourse.

The Père d'Aigrigny began to repent having commenced this contest; however, with ill-repressed irony, he remarked,—

"I do not dispute the smallness of your means employed; I agree with you, that they are very puerile, extremely commonplace; they are not sufficient to inspire me with a very elevated opinion of your merits. I shall therefore take leave to ask you ——"

"What those small means produced?" interrupted Rodin, with an excitement by no means usual with him. "Look, then, at my spider's web, and you will see that young and insolent girl, so proud six weeks since of her loveliness, her intelligence, her boldness, at this moment pale, dejected, and mortally wounded to the very heart."

"But that trait of chivalric intrepidity of the Indian prince with which all Paris was moved," said the princess, "Mademoiselle de Cardoville must have been touched by that!"

"Yes; but I paralysed the effect of that stupid and wild devotion, by shewing the young girl that it was not sufficient to kill black panthers, in order to prove oneself a sensitive, delicate, and faithful lover."

"True," said Père d'Aigrigny, "this is a gain; for Mademoiselle de Cardoville is wounded to the heart."

"But what results from this for the interests of the Rennepont affair?" inquired the cardinal with curiosity, and putting his elbows on the table.

"In the first place, it results," replied Rodin, "that the most dangerous enemy we can have is severely wounded, and leaves the field of battle, I think that is something!"

"No doubt," said the princess, "the mind and daring of Mademoiselle de Cardoville might have formed the soul of a coalition directed against us."

"True," added Père d'Aigrigny, obstinately; "in this sense we need no longer to be feared, and that is an advantage; but this wound in the heart will not preclude her from inheriting."

"Who tells you so?" asked Rodin, with calm assurance.

"Do you know why I did so much to bring her and Djalma together in the first instance, in spite of herself, and afterwards to separate them in spite of herself?"

"I should like to know," said Père d'Aigrigny, "how this storm of passions will prevent Mademoiselle de Cardoville and the Prince from inheriting?"

"Is it from the calm sky or the stormy sky that proceeds the lightning which dazzles and strikes?" said Rodin, in a haughty tone. "Be easy; I know where to place the conductor. As to M. Hardy, that man lived for three things,—his workmen, a friend, and a mistress! He has received three arrows straight in his heart: I always aim at the heart. I fired it right and sure."

"It is right, and sure, and praiseworthy," said the bishop; "for, if I have heard aright, this manufacturer had a concubine, and it is well to make a wicked passion serve for the weapon to strike the offender."

"That is palpable," added the cardinal; "they have wicked propensities; we make use of them; it is their fault."

"Our holy mother Perpetue," chimed in the princess, "has used all means in her power to discover the whole of this abominable adultery!"

"So, then, we have M. Hardy smitten in his tenderest affections."

"I admit," said Père d'Aigrigny, yielding his ground only inch by inch, "he is smitten in his fortune, but that will only make him the more eager in his pursuit of this vast inheritance."

This argument appeared serious to the two prelates and the princess, who all looked at Rodin with intense curiosity. He, instead of making any reply, went towards the buffet, and, contrary to his usual habit of stoic sobriety, in spite of his repugnance for wine, looked at the decanters and said,—

"What is in these?"

"Bordeaux and sherry," said Madame de Saint-Dizier, much surprised at Rodin's sudden taste.

He took up a decanter hap-hazard, poured out a glass of Madeira, and drank it off at a draught. For some moments he had felt himself seized all over with a sudden and strange shuddering, which had been followed by a sort of faintness, which he trusted the wine would overcome.

After having wiped his lips with the back of his dirty hand, he returned to the table, and addressing the Père d'Aigrigny, said,—

"What did you desire to know with respect to M. Hardy?"

"Why, being injured in his fortune, he will only be the more eager after this immense inheritance," repeated the Père d'Aigrigny, internally enraged at the imperious tone of his superior.

"M. Hardy think of money?" said Rodin, shrugging his shoulders, "does he think of any thing? every hope is destroyed within him. Indifferent to the things of this world he is plunged in a stupor, which he only quits for paroxysms of tears; then he talks with mechanical kindness to those who surround him with the utmost care (I have placed him in excellent hands), and now he begins to shew himself sensible to the tender commiseration which is unremittingly testified towards him, for he is good—excellent—as excellent as weak; and it is to this excellence that I shall direct your attention, Père d'Aigrigny, in order that you may work out what is left to do."

"I?" inquired Père d'Aigrigny, greatly astonished.

"Yes; and then you will see if the result I have obtained is not considerable, and ——"

Again interrupting himself, Rodin passed his hand over his brow, saying to himself, "This is strange!"

"What ails you?" inquired the princess, with interest.

"Nothing, madam," replied Rodin, with a shudder; "it is no doubt the wine I have drunk. I am not accustomed to it, and I feel my head rather uncomfortable—but it will soon go off."

"Indeed, my dear Père, your eyes look very much inflamed," said the princess.

"That is because I have looked too intently at my web," resumed the Jesuit, with his sinister smile, "and I must examine it again, in order to clear the eyesight of Père d'Aigrigny, who seems near-sighted. My other flies—the two daughters of General Simon, for instance—from day to day more sad, more dejected, as they feel a barrier of ice rise up between them and the maréchal. And he, since his father's death, you should see, hear, how he is torn, distracted by opposing thoughts; to-day believing himself dishonoured if he does this—to-morrow disgraced if he does it not: this soldier, this hero of the empire, is now more weak, more irresolute than a child. Who then remains of this impious family? Jacques Rennepont! Ask Morok into what state of insanity dissipation has thrown the poor wretch, and towards what abyss he is hastening! This is my Balance-Sheet—this is the state of isolation, desolation, into which, at this moment, the members of this family are plunged, they who would have combined but six weeks since so many powerful, energetic, and dangerous elements, if they had but been united! Such are they now—these Renneponts, who, by the advice of their heretical ancestor, were to concentrate their powers to combat and crush us; and they were greatly to be dreaded. What did I say? Why, that I would act upon their passions. What have I done? I have acted on their passions; and therefore it is at this moment that they struggle in my toils, which enclose them on all sides. They are mine, I tell you,—they are mine."

For some moments, and whilst he spoke, Rodin's physiognomy and voice underwent a singular change; his complexion, usually so cadaverous, became more and more flushed, but unequally, and, as it were, in streaks; then, strange phenomenon! his eyes, becoming more and more glaring, seemed to grow more hollow, whilst his voice sounded broken, harsh, and tremulous.

The alteration in Rodin's features, of which he did not appear in the least conscious, was so striking, that the other actors in this scene looked at him with a kind of fear.

Mistaking the cause of their looks, Rodin, indignant, exclaimed in a voice occasionally interrupted by spasms of deep and impeded breathing,—

"Is it pity for this impious race that I read in your countenances? Pity! for a young girl who never sets foot in a church, and raises heathen altars in her own residence? Pity! for M. Hardy, a sentimental blasphemer, a philanthropic atheist, who had not a chapel in his factory, and dared to place the names of Socrates, Marcus Aurelius, and Plato, beside that of our Saviour, who called Jesus the divine philosopher? Pity! for this Indian of the sect of Brahma? Pity! for these two sisters, who have not received the rite of baptism? Pity! for that brute Jacques Rennepont? Pity! for that stupid imperial soldier, who has Napoleon for his God, and for his Gospel the bulletins of the grande armée? Pity! for this family of renegades whose ancestor, a relapsed heretic, not content with having robbed us of our property, still from the depths of his tomb excites his accursed race to raise its head against us after a century and a half? What! to defend ourselves from these vipers, have we not a right to crush them in the venom which they themselves have distilled? And I tell you, I, that it is serving God, it is giving a wholesome example, to devote, in the face of all, and by the very workings of their own passions, this impious family to agony—despair—death!”

Rodin was frightful in his fierceness as he thus spoke—the glare of his eyes became even more ardent, his lips were dry and parched, a cold sweat was on his brow, and his temples beat convulsively, whilst renewed chill shudderings pervaded his entire frame. Ascribing his increasing suffering to over-fatigue, for he had been writing during the greater portion of the night, and desirous of preventing a renewal of his weakness, he went to the sideboard, poured out another glass of wine, which he swallowed at a draught, and returned to the table, at the moment when the cardinal was saying,—

“If the steps you are taking with regard to this family had any need of justification, my very dear father, you would have gloriously justified it by your last words; not only according to the casuists, I repeat, are you entirely in the right, but there is nothing reprehensible even according to the laws of the world: as to divine laws, it is pleasing to the Lord to contend against and overthrow the impious with the weapons which they themselves furnish.”

Overcome as well as the rest by the devilish assurance of Rodin, and impelled to a sort of fearful admiration, the Père d’Aigrigny said to him,—

“I confess I was wrong to doubt your reverence’s mind: deceived as to the means you have employed, considering them in detached parts, I could not judge of their redoubtable combination, and especially of the results which they have actually produced. Now I see that, thanks to you, success is no longer doubtful.”

“And this is an exaggeration,” replied Rodin, with feverish impatience. “All these passions are at this moment boiling, but the moment is very critical, and as the alchemist bends over his crucible, in which boils a mixture which may give him treasure or death, I alone can at this juncture —”

Rodin could not finish, but raised his two hands suddenly to his head and uttered a low cry of stifled pain.

“What ails you?” said Père d’Aigrigny, “for the last few minutes you have become dreadfully pale.”

“I do not know what is the matter with me,” said Rodin, in an altered voice, “my headach increases, and a sort of vertigo has made me very giddy for a moment.”

“Sit down,” said the princess, in a tone of interest.

"Take something," added the bishop.

"It is nothing," continued Rodin, making a strong effort over himself; "thank God I am not made of down. I slept but little during the night—it is fatigue—nothing more. I was saying, that I alone can direct this affair at this crisis, but not execute it. I must disappear, to watch incessantly in obscurity, where I shall hold all the threads which I—I alone, can manage," added Rodin, in an oppressed voice.

"My very dear father," said the cardinal, with uneasiness, "I am sure you are seriously unwell; your cheeks are becoming quite livid."

"Possibly," replied Rodin, courageously; "but I do not give way to trifles. Let us return to our business. Now is the moment, Père d'Aigrigny, when your qualities—and you have great ones, I have never disputed or denied—can come to me with great effect. You have a winning way, an attractive demeanour, and seductive eloquence. It will be requisite."

Rodin paused again. His brow was streaming with chill perspiration, he felt his limbs give way under him, and he said, in spite of his energetic obstinacy,—

"I confess it, I do not feel well; yet this morning I was as well as usual. I tremble in spite of myself; I am icy cold."

"Come nearer the fire; it is a sudden attack," said the bishop, offering him his arm with heroic devotion. "It will not be any thing of consequence."

"If you would take something warm to drink—a cup of tea," said the princess. "M. Baleinier will, fortunately, be here very soon, and he will make us easy as to this indisposition."

"Really it is inexplicable," said the prelate.

At these words of the cardinal, Rodin, who had approached the fire in great agony, turned his eyes towards the prelate and looked at him fixedly for a second in a singular manner, then, strong in his indomitable energy, in spite of the alteration of his features, which were visibly and materially changing, Rodin said in a broken voice, which he endeavoured to render firm,—

"The fire has somewhat warmed me; it will be nothing. Ma foi! I have time certainly to be nursed and cosseted. How à propos it would be to fall sick at this crisis of the Rennepont affair, which can only succeed by and through me alone! Let us, therefore, return to business. I tell you, Père d'Aigrigny, that you can very materially serve us; and you also, Madame la Princesse, for you have espoused this cause as if it were your own; and ——"

Rodin paused again. This time he uttered a piercing cry, fell back in a chair near him, threw himself back in it convulsively, and pressing his two hands against his chest, cried,—

"Oh, how I suffer!"

And immediately, to the fearful alteration already spread over the features of Rodin, succeeded a cadaverous hue, covering the countenance in an instant with the ghastly pallor of a corpse in which decomposition has already commenced; his eyes, already sunken in his head, were rigid and injected with blood, while they seemed to retreat into their very orbits, whose darkened shadow formed a black hollow ring around the red glowing eyeballs; violent spasmodic pangs tore his entrails and contracted the hard features of his bony countenance. To these acute pains succeeded a collapse, which, releasing the skin from tension, left it flaccid, damp, and covered with a cold sweat like that of death, while a hideous tinge of green, mingled with the corpse-like colour the face had before exhibited; from his lips, which were rigid and convulsed by the dire torments he underwent, escaped a breathing, hot, fetid, and gasping, mingled with continual groans, and cries of, "Oh, what I suffer! What torture is this? I burn—I die!"

Then, impelled by a fresh paroxysm of pain, Rodin, almost maddened, tore his naked breast with the points of his sharp nails, for he had early torn off the buttons of his waistcoat, and ripped open his soiled and greasy shirt-front, as though the pressure of his garments increased the violence of the sufferings under which he writhed.

The bishop, the cardinal, and Father d'Aigrigny, rushed towards Rodin to tender their assistance. At that instant he was seized with fresh convulsions, and, all at once collecting his strength, he rose up on his feet stiff and rigid as a corpse; then, his dress disordered, his thin grey hair standing like bristles around his distorted visage, green with all the sickening colours of the charnel-house, and fixing his red and glaring eyes upon the cardinal, who at this instant was stooping over him, he grasped him with his convulsed fingers, and with a fearful tone he cried, in a half-suffocated voice,—

"Cardinal Malipieri, this illness is too sudden—I am mistrusted at Rome—you come of the race of Borgia, and your secretary was with me this morning."

"Unhappy man!" exclaimed the prelate, as thunderstruck as indignant at this accusation. "What does he mean by words like these?"

And, so speaking, the cardinal sought to free himself from the tight grasp of the Jesuit, whose stiffening fingers closed upon him with the tenacity of iron.

"I have been poisoned!" murmured Rodin. Then relapsing into utter exhaustion, he sunk back into the arms of Father d'Aigrigny.

Spite of his terror, the cardinal had time to whisper in a low tone to D'Aigrigny,—

"He fancies that we wish to poison him! he is, therefore, conscious of being engaged in some dangerous machinations against us!"

The door of the salon opened at this juncture and admitted Dr. Baleinier.

"Ah, doctor!" exclaimed the princess, running, pale and terrified, to meet him, "how thankful I am for your presence! Father Rodin has just been suddenly attacked with the most frightful convulsions. Pray, pray, hasten to his succour."

"Convulsions! Oh, that is nothing, madame. Be under no alarm, I beg," said the doctor, throwing his hat on a chair, and hurrying towards the group who surrounded the dying man.

"Here is the doctor!" cried the princess. And as M. Baleinier approached all drew aside, except D'Aigrigny, who was supporting Rodin, who had sunk almost lifeless in a chair.

"Gracious Heavens!" exclaimed Dr. Baleinier, examining the countenance of Rodin (which from green was becoming of a bluish hue), with increasing alarm, "what fearful symptoms are these?"

"What is the matter?" inquired all the spectators in a voice.

"The matter!" replied the doctor, stepping backwards as though he had trodden on a serpent; "the sickness which has seized upon Father Rodin is spasmodic cholera! which carries death and contagion with it!"

At these fatal sounds D'Aigrigny let go his hold of Rodin, who sank from the chair on which he was partly reclining on to the floor.

"He is a dead man!" cried Dr. Baleinier; "still I will go in search of what alone can be employed as a last effort to save him."

And with these words he rushed towards the door, so quickly followed by the Princess de Saint-Dizier, Father d'Aigrigny, the bishop, and cardinal, that, all precipitating themselves towards the same point, the confusion became so great that not one among them could manage to open the door.

An unseen hand at length opened it from without, and Gabriel appeared, the type of all that is holy, sincere, pure-minded, and heavenly in a priest,—such a one as would, indeed, merit the universal respect, admiration, and tenderest sympathy of all mankind, his divine countenance and angelic calmness contrasting strangely with the terrified, fear-stricken countenances of the agitated beings by whom he was surrounded. Ere, however, the young man could understand the cause of all this alarm, he was all but thrown down by the fugitives, who swept by him, exclaiming,—

"Enter not! Fly, fly!—save yourself! He is dying of cholera!"

At these words, and pushing the bishop, who was last in the flying party, back into the salon, Gabriel flew onwards to Rodin, while the bishop, thankful to be freed from any further interruption to his flight, once more made for the door, and availed himself of the free egress left him by the entrance of Gabriel to rush after his companions.

Rodin, meanwhile, lay writhing in fearful agonies on the carpet, his limbs distorted by the most dreadful cramps, and his frame shaken by direful spasmodic throes. His fall had probably recalled his wandering recollection, for he murmured forth in a sepulchral voice,—

"They have left me, then, to die like a dog! Oh, cowards! Help, help! Alas, no one comes!"

And as the dying man lay prostrate on the ground, he, by a convulsive movement, contrived to raise himself on one elbow, and casting his hideous looks towards the ceiling, while his eyes glared with mingled fury and desperation, he cried again in utter desolation of spirit, "No, no one will approach me! none, none!"

But at this instant his fierce and glaring glances encountered the large blue eyes and mild heavenly countenance of Gabriel, who, kneeling beside him, said in his usual sweet, yet serious voice,—

"I am here, father, ready to succour and assist you, if, indeed, earthly aid be yet available; or to offer up my prayers for you and with you, should it be the Lord's pleasure to call you hence!"

“Gabriel!” uttered Rodin, faintly; “pardon—for the wrong—I have done you. Pity me—and do not abandon me!—do not ——”

The wretched man could proceed no further; he uttered a shrill cry of sharp agony, his strength utterly forsook him, and he fell extended on the floor, speechless and motionless.

* * * * *

In the evening papers of that day was to be read the following announcement:—

“The cholera is in Paris, the first case declared itself to-day at half-past three o’clock at the Hôtel de Saint-Dizier, Rue de Babylone.”

END OF VOL. II.

LONDON:

PRINTED BY MOYES AND BARCLAY, CASTLE STREET, LEICESTER SQUARE.

RODIN ATTACKED BY CHOLERA.

